

General Assembly

Seventy-first session

4th plenary meeting
Monday, 19 September 2016, 9.30 a.m.
New York

Official Records

President: Mr. Thomson (Fiji)

The meeting was called to order at 10 a.m.

High-level plenary meeting on addressing large movements of refugees and migrants

Agenda items 13 and 117 (continued)

Integrated and coordinated implementation of and follow-up to the outcomes of the major United Nations conferences and summits in the economic, social and related fields

Follow-up to the outcome of the Millennium Summit

Co-Chair Lykketoft: Before we begin the list of speakers, I would like to turn to some organizational matters pertaining to the conduct of the plenary meeting. In accordance with resolution 70/290, of 30 June 2016, the list of speakers was established on the basis that statements would be limited to 4 minutes. To assist speakers in managing their time, a light system has been installed at the speaker's rostrum. May I appeal to all speakers for their cooperation in observing the time limit as they make their statements, so that all those inscribed can be heard in a timely manner.

The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Andrej Kiska, President of the Slovak Republic.

President Kiska: I am thankful to have this opportunity to speak first in the Hall. The migration crisis is one of the worst crises to occur since the Second World War. Millions of people are leaving their countries because of war, fear or a lack of food. I would like to make three points.

First, we should not speak in numbers, but about real human problems with regard to children, mothers, fathers and families. We should not talk of millions, but about individual cases of those who are running away from the threat of death. I had a chance to meet refugees from Iraq in our country. When I spoke with them, they told me that they had had three hours to leave and if they had not left, they would have died. That is how we should be thinking — about the real lives and stories of people.

To do that — and this is my second point — we must think about how to work efficiently. Working efficiently means putting our best tools, organizations and people together. For that reason Slovakia welcomes the new agreement between the United Nations and the International Organization for Migration. In addition, my country, which now holds the presidency of the Council of the European Union, advocates a sustainable migration and asylum policy.

Lastly, sometimes we forget that our countries are successful. At times we forget that we therefore have a moral duty. Not only the moral duty of successful people to think about how to help others, but also the moral duty of modern, successful countries to reflect on how to help people in need and how to share their wealth.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Muhammadu Buhari, President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

President Buhari: It is a great honour to address the General Assembly and join in the efforts to find a

This record contains the text of speeches delivered in English and of the translation of speeches delivered in other languages. Corrections should be submitted to the original languages only. They should be incorporated in a copy of the record and sent under the signature of a member of the delegation concerned to the Chief of the Verbatim Reporting Service, room U-0506 (verbatimrecords@un.org). Corrected records will be reissued electronically on the Official Document System of the United Nations (<http://documents.un.org>).

16-28982 (E)

Accessible document

Please recycle

solution to the growing concerns about large movements of migrants, refugees and internally displaced persons across the world. It is not a mere coincidence that such movements are occurring around the world, given the ongoing crises and economic, social and political upheavals with serious consequences. We all know that migration is not a crime, especially when persons move across international boundaries to seek refuge from danger to life or personal liberty or from risk of imprisonment. Human movement is a necessary expression of the fundamental right to the freedoms of safety and self-actualization, and taking refuge is a legitimate right recognized by international humanitarian law.

The world is indeed in a dilemma. Nations are required under international humanitarian law to ensure the free movement of persons, particularly those escaping from imminent danger to their lives, by guaranteeing their safety, security and dignity. That responsibility comes at huge financial cost and with serious implications for the national peace and security of nations in fragile political and economic condition. It is equally unfortunate that nations that are capable and willing to absorb large numbers of refugees and migrants are, with few exceptions, such as Jordan, Lebanon and Germany, exercising restraint in the light of the threats posed by terrorists and violent extremist groups. That is particularly important, as such nations also have the corresponding obligation to protect their own territorial integrity and safeguard the well-being of their own citizens.

The cause concerning refugees and migrants in the case of Nigeria would be incomplete without reference to our internally displaced persons — the victims of Boko Haram's terrible atrocities. The Boko Haram insurgency has caused a huge refugee problem, amounting to an estimated 600,000 persons for Nigeria's neighbouring nations. In Nigeria, over 2 million internally displaced persons from the north-east live in various camps across the country. In addressing that challenge, Nigeria, in collaboration with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, recently hosted a regional dialogue on the displacement of persons, within the framework of a regional protection dialogue in the Lake Chad basin. Let me also state that we have diligently implemented several people-oriented programmes, such as the Protection Intervention Committee for the rehabilitation of the north-east, the Victim Support Fund, the Safe Schools initiative and the North-East Development Commission, currently under legislative process, so as to meet the humanitarian needs of internally displaced persons. We are making a concerted effort to meet our citizens' immediate humanitarian needs by reducing their risk and vulnerability and increasing their resilience through vocational training and skills-acquisition programmes.

Nigeria has also demonstrated appreciable concern with regard to issues of global human mobility by putting in place a number of instruments for control purposes, which include a national migration policy, a labour migration policy, laws on trafficking in persons and Nigerian immigration and national drug law enforcement agencies. I hope that the threat posed by Boko Haram and the Islamic State in Iraq and the Sham will be taken very seriously.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Gjorge Ivanov, President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

President Ivanov (spoke in Macedonian; English text provided by the delegation): We are living in the twenty-first century, in a time of hope and fear. On one hand, we have hopes for a better life, education, economic development and the protection of the lives of citizens and their property. On the other hand, there is a fear of the consequences of regional conflicts and crises. Movements of migrants and refugees have been triggered both by the pursuit of happiness and by the flight from fear. Twenty million illegal migrants and refugees now find themselves near the external borders of Europe and are being encouraged to use certain corridors in order to reach Europe. We need a common approach to handling the migration crisis and reducing the security risks by making a clear distinction between the legal, humanitarian, political, economic and social aspects and the security aspects of the crisis.

This new era of a cruel twenty-first century requires new leadership and the establishment of new institutions that would then be able to manage crises and risks. The threat of illegal migration is a perfect tool for exercising non-military pressure in the management of crises and conflicts. It is done by exporting migrants and directing them on a path towards their final destination. That has brought about serious tensions among European countries. The challenges of security in the European Union (EU) increasingly depend on leadership, political stability and crisis management by the Governments of third countries that are on the main entrance and exit corridors. However, those third countries are situated in a geographic position that enables them to control the gates of the corridors. The European Union needs stable and secure third countries that are capable of protecting those corridors.

The Republic of Macedonia's approach to managing the migration crisis is a proactive and preventive one.

We were the first country in Europe to declare a state of crisis and to deploy army troops at the borders, including establishing a joint military-civilian headquarters so as to strengthen border security protection and to channel the movement of migrants without allowing them to enter cities and have contact with radicalized persons or returnees from conflict zones in the process. One might compare the migrant flow to a flood. The crisis management system must therefore be activated and army troops deployed so as to support civilian services in their efforts to handle the flood. The crisis management system must also develop contingency plans and make use of a strategy for eliminating the consequences of the flood. It should involve defensive measures such as so-called dams at external borders, a cleaning process with a hotspot approach and the securing of channels and the control of the refugee flows at the entrance and exit corridors and the routes used by refugees, migrants and foreign terrorist fighters.

We have assumed the responsibility of being the gatekeepers of Europe. The deployment of army troops in support of police forces protecting the border has resulted in an interruption of the illegal migration movement through the so-called Balkan corridor. We must therefore support the revision of legislation concerning the participation of the army in the protection of borders and national security and in countering terrorism. With regard to the assistance requested in relation to the security aspect of the crisis, several partner countries have responded by seconding police officers and providing border protection equipment and financial assistance, namely, Hungary, Croatia, Serbia, Slovenia, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Austria and Poland. Currently, Macedonia hosts 110 foreign police officers who are assisting us in protecting our border.

The Republic of Macedonia has been left without access to EU databases for the input and comparison of data on migrants and foreign terrorist fighters. There is also a lack of cooperation among intelligence services.

All of that happens amid negative media perception surrounding the implementation of the European Union's decisions. Despite the internal political crisis, Macedonia has shown that it has stable institutions for managing the migrant crisis and reducing security risks. In that connection, I wish to convey a message to the European Union. Macedonia needs assistance in order to help the European Union. External borders cannot be protected unless the corridors in countries outside of the EU are secured. Macedonia will act to protect its national security. Any solution that involves housing migrants and creating refugee camps in non-EU member countries along the corridor will not be sustainable, and can therefore not be allowed. We do not have the capacity or resources to address the expected volume of migrants, which could lead to instability in our State.

Courage is expensive and rare in Europe today. Macedonia has shown that it has the courage to face the ongoing threats under the conditions of the ongoing political crisis. The other challenge that we need to address is diversity in major cities. Tolerance for diversity must be replaced by respect for diversity.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Mahamadou Issoufou, President of the Republic of the Niger.

Mr. Issoufou (spoke in French): It is an honour for the Niger to take part in today's high-level meeting to discuss the management of massive movements of refugees and migrants. The fundamental aim is to bring countries together around a more humane and better-coordinated approach. Several meetings were held last year, and this year, on this issue of concern to us all, including the Valletta Summit on Migration, held in Malta on 11 and 12 November 2015; the high-level meeting of the twenty-first Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, held in Paris from 30 November to 12 December 2015; the first World Humanitarian Summit, held in Istanbul on 23 and 24 May 2016; and today's meeting.

The Niger stressed the need to address the root causes of the massive movements of refugees and migrants at all of those meetings. The main causes are poverty, inequality, insecurity, lack of democracy and the pernicious effects of climate change. The international community must therefore address such root causes, combat the trafficking in migrants, encourage regulated migration, protect migrants and, if necessary, ensure their return, readmission and reintegration into their countries of origin in full respect for human rights. That is why I welcome the proposal of the Secretary-General on the development of two global conventions — one on shared responsibility for refugees and migrants and the other on safe, coordinated and regulated migration.

The Niger is among the countries in which such massive movements of refugees and migrants have occurred. The Niger is suffering the consequences of the Libyan and Malian crises and the terrorism of Boko Haram in the Lake Chad basin. Because of such crises, the Niger has had to receive thousands of Malian and Nigerian refugees, as well as the Niger refugees returning from Libya. It also has to deal with the internal displacement of people in the Lake Chad region. The Niger is also a transit country for migrants heading towards Europe. Approximately 100,000 migrants passed through the Niger in 2015. The Niger is now suffering the effects of climate change, with extreme flooding and drought, making hundreds of thousands of our citizens vulnerable every year.

In the light of all of those challenges, the Niger calls for a consistent response from the international community. In addition, we also call for a speedy resolution of the Libyan crisis. That of course requires the mobilization and reconciliation of all Libyans as part of an inclusive Government of national unity. The Niger also calls for the stabilization of the situation in Mali. In order to achieve that, the United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali must be strengthened, because the situation in that country is not a traditional peacekeeping situation. The Niger commends the action taken by the Multinational Joint Task Force to combat Boko Haram and invites the international community to support the countries of the Lake Chad basin as they face an unprecedented humanitarian crisis. With regard to migration issues, the Niger proposed a plan of action at the Europe-Africa Summit in Valletta. The funding for that plan of action would allow the Niger to assist in ending the tragic migrant situation throughout the Sahara.

The issue of the massive movements of refugees and migrants requires substantive political, economic and social responses. That would entail a shift in political and economic governance, not only within each of our respective countries but also globally. I hope that the international community will design and implement solutions that will enable us to build a more just and humane world.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The General Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Jacob Zuma, President of the Republic of South Africa

President Zuma: I would like to extend South Africa's appreciation to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon for convening this timely meeting to address the large movements of refugees and migrants. South Africa welcomes the adoption of the outcome document (resolution 71/1) by Member States this morning.

We must alleviate the plight of refugees and migrants everywhere and pave the way for equitable burden-sharing among States. However, the movement of people across international boundaries is not a new phenomenon. As we address this issue, South Africa wishes to caution Member States not to forget that the plight of forcibly displaced persons should be treated with equal concern, whether they form part of large or small movements of people.

South Africa recognizes that, in order to adequately address that challenge, we must address its root causes and understand that underdevelopment is a key driver of the displacement of people that can in turn lead to armed conflict. A concerted global effort to address the questions of underdevelopment and armed conflict should therefore be a central focus for all Member States. Sub-Saharan Africa has hosted, and continues to host, a vast number of forcibly displaced persons, with South Africa being the largest single recipient of asylum-seekers. We provide shelter and support to forcibly displaced persons, in line with the fundamental rights set out in our Constitution.

We welcome the global action being taken to alleviate the pressures resulting from the movement of displaced persons anywhere else. But it is also important not to glide over the causes, which vary. Before the problems in Libya arose, North Africa was at peace with itself. It was the manner in which we handled the Libyan question that has given rise to refugees coming from that country and crossing to Europe and elsewhere.

I think that tells us that whenever we take action where there are full-fledged or emerging problems, we must think very carefully. We must look at what could be the consequences of such actions, because the movement of people arises from various causes, some of which were not at all necessary. In some cases, the actions taken were in the interests of those who were outside of the countries where the problems began. Consequently, in considering the issue, we must also look at other very fresh actions that have resulted in creating insecurity in other areas.

We look forward to continued engagement on this urgent matter and to finding real solutions. We rededicate ourselves to being a partner for positive change in that regard.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Borut Pahor, President of the Republic of Slovenia.

President Pahor: Migration has been a constant feature of human history. It is a part of global progress and development, and migrants have been important drivers of economic, social, cultural and human evolution. When talking about the benefits of migration, what we have in mind is safe, orderly and regular migration. Our objective today is to avoid irregular migration and firmly combat the criminal networks that take advantage of it.

We must also bolster efforts to prevent false expectations, disinformation and distorted images of the life that awaits migrants and refugees outside their homelands. In fact, we should strengthen our cooperation in all aspects of migration management, including the return and reintegration of irregular migrants to their countries of origin.

The most effective way to address the crisis is to find a viable solution that enables us to tackle its root causes and push factors. That can be done only through the joint efforts of the entire international community, in the spirit of shared responsibility and solidarity, open dialogue and cooperation. The current global crisis is a stark reminder for all us that we need to accelerate our efforts and work together.

The European Union faces immense migration pressure on both its maritime and its land borders. My country, Slovenia, as a transit country, has also faced an unprecedented flow of migrants and refugees fleeing conflicts in the Middle East and North Africa. From mid-October 2015 to date, nearly half a million people have entered our country — a number equivalent to about a quarter of the entire population of Slovenia. We have therefore experienced at first hand how important it is to collaborate closely with partners within and outside the European Union and with international organizations. Slovenia actively participates in the European Union reallocation and resettlement scheme and has over the past two years also significantly increased its humanitarian assistance to internally displaced persons and refugees.

Let me conclude my remarks by saying that the politics of peace and dialogue must prevail, and we must ensure cooperation on the basis of international law and principles. The United Nations needs to play a more prominent role in the process. To that end, we should perhaps also think of correcting the existing United Nations architecture in order to make it more efficient in conflict prevention and the resolution of disputes.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Andrzej Duda, President of the Republic of Poland.

President Duda (spoke in Polish; interpretation provided by the delegation): A growing number of States in various parts of the world are today confronting unprecedented migration. That phenomenon concerns not only Europe, Africa and the Middle East, but also every region and continent. We are all struggling now to deal with large movements of people, which are a consequence not only of armed conflicts, aggression and violence, but also of economic crises and natural disasters.

I have pondered the solution to the problem of mass migration and have come to the conclusion that the element that is often missing in the debate is differentiating between economic migration and war refugees. Indeed, those different phenomena require entirely different responses. If we merge the tragedy of refugees with the needs of economic migrants, we will not be able to provide effective assistance to either of those groups, because their aspirations are entirely different. The cause of economic migration is generally the fact that people are striving to improve their financial situation and gain access to entitlements to social benefits, whereas the source of war and political refugee flows is always the desire to save one's life or to protect one's health.

The scale of migratory flows in the world today is immense. According to estimates in my country, Poland, more than 1 million economic migrants, mainly from the East, have become permanent residents. In turn, based on various estimates, 1 to 2 million citizens have left Poland to work in other European Union countries.

Large-scale social migration forced by politicians represents a very irresponsible course of action. There are many areas in which social migration can engender social tensions, prejudice, false accusations about the alleged stealing of jobs or intentions to abuse the social system of the receiving State. Unfortunately, there are some politicians who take advantage of such attitudes. They try to gain popularity by dwelling on unfair generalizations. It should be incumbent on politicians to prevent such harmful stereotypes from emerging and destroying the social order. I do realize that there are also people whose objective is not to improve their situation in life through work, but to abuse social rights. Obviously, State authorities are obliged to curb such practices, especially since the latter tend to reinforce the conviction among the public that all economic migrants are dishonest.

As far as war refugees are concerned, I would like to underscore two tasks ahead of us.

First, the international community must eliminate the real root causes behind refugee flows and restore everyone's right to live in his or her own home country. We shall never overcome the tragedy of refugees as long as we do not put an end to the conflicts that arise, often from imperial ambitions, ethnic hatred or economic interest. There are no wars without reasons, hence there are no wars that could not be put an end to.

Secondly, it is our duty to cooperate in order to permanently eliminate the crimes committed by individuals who inhumanely prey on the tragedy of refugees. I am referring to the operations of criminal groups that collect money under the pretext of protecting, transporting or smuggling refugees, as well as the phenomena of money laundering through banks of the civilized world and deal-making with criminals and murderers. Putting an end to such practices will not solve the problem entirely, but will certainly reduce the tragedy of people who suffer two-fold — first as a result of war and then because of actions perpetrated by those who prey on their misfortune.

We cannot turn a blind eye to the bloodstained money that circulates around the world. In each of those aspects, the situation today demands effective solutions. The Republic of Poland is ready to actively participate in such endeavours.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Baron Divavesi Waqa, President of the Republic of Nauru.

President Waqa: Nauru welcomes the adoption of resolution 71/1, aimed at addressing large movements of refugees and migrants. The outpouring of support that we have heard today concerning the plight of refugees and migrants should be applauded. But it must not be forgotten that the humanitarian crisis we face today is largely the result of deliberate policy choices made in the realms of economics, security and the environment. The material gains of globalization and technological advancement have not been shared equitably, and large-scale migration has been one of the predictable results.

The crisis has human origins, which should be deeply troubling to all leaders entrusted with protecting the lives and well-being of their people. However, that also means that we have the power to solve the problem if we work together. In that regard, I will take this opportunity to share with the Assembly Nauru's efforts to address this global crisis through the provision of processing services and temporary settlement for asylum-seekers.

My country is a typical source country, transit country or destination that can offer permanent settlement to refugees or migrants. We are a small island in the middle of the Pacific, an isolated oasis far from strife and conflict. In 2001 and again in 2012, we were invited to assist in managing migration in our region in the face of the thousands of deaths at sea of men, women and children. Recognizing the humanitarian imperative of taking action, we offered our country as a place where asylum-seekers could be hosted and put into a refugee-processing system. This remote processing model is able to take away the benefit being offered by people smugglers, reduce or eliminate death at sea, ensure that States can control their borders, and, at the same time, ensure that people in need are granted protection.

The implementation of this model is not without its issues, so it is important that I share with you Nauru's first-hand experience — both our achievements and challenges. We have established a robust, fair and impartial refugee determination system, which means that remote processing does not prevent people from seeking protection; rather, it ensures that people seeking protection are able to have their claims properly processed in a timely way. We seek to ensure all the rights of asylum-seekers and to accord the rights established in the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees to those who are found to be refugees, including the issuance of 1951 Convention travel documents.

We encourage States to recognize such documents, which conform to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and International Civil Aviation Organization specifications. We are Convention signatories, as well as an active member of the Bali Process on People Smuggling, Trafficking in Persons and Related Transnational Crime. Our system for determining asylum claims complies with UNHCR guidelines.

Nauru is well placed to provide surge capacity for migrant flows and to be a place of processing and transition on the path to viable permanent outcomes. However, finding durable settlement solutions for our refugees is the missing component. In a comprehensive strategy, an outflow of refugees to permanent settlement countries is the essential last step of the model. I invite members to partner with us in providing permanent homes for the 924 refugee men, women and children currently in Nauru.

My Government is committed to continuing our contribution towards a safe, humane and dignified strategy for international and regional cooperation in addressing this humanitarian emergency.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa, President of the Republic of Portugal.

President Rebelo de Sousa: The management of migratory flows is one of the greatest challenges we have to face at the United Nations today. It is essential to place people at the centre of our decisions, as was promised several years ago at the High-level Dialogue of the General Assembly on migration and development (A/68/PV.25). But how do we make the transition from words to the practice of dignity? We need concrete and feasible responses based on cooperation among countries, States, international organizations and civil society, and on respect for human rights, but mostly we must integrate the policies of migration, humanitarian assistance and development.

A lot is being said about the reception of refugees and migrants, but not so much about their full integration and the causes of what is happening everywhere and what led to the causes. The cooperation between nations and civil society must be much more effective in stabilizing political situations, solving conflicts, and stimulating investment, professional skill and job creation in countries facing important economic and social challenges. We have been working on such a pre-emptive strategy.

Concerning integration, Portugal promotes granting the children of all migrants access to education and health-care systems, regardless of whether they have regular or irregular legal status. We have reinforced the protection of undocumented children. Their information is confidential and cannot be shared with migration authorities. That is a way of helping them have full access to both health care and learning.

But when one speaks of managing the refugee crisis, one needs to look at the situation of those young people. They need to continue their studies, including university and polytechnical school studies. Such access is the reason for the establishment of the so-called Global Platform for Syrian Students, led by the former President of the Republic of Portugal, Mr. Jorge Sampaio. We have already integrated many young Syrian students into universities in 10 countries. We even support the idea of creating a rapid-response mechanism for higher education in emergencies.

With regard to Europe's involvement, we have accepted our duties. We have doubled the number of people whom we are receiving in our country for reasons of solidarity and have received thousands of people from everywhere through Turkey, Greece, Italy and Egypt, the latter in cooperation with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. We have increased our financial contributions to every organization and humanitarian agency active in this field.

Today we saw a very important step — the adoption of resolution 71/1, entitled “New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants”. That is just a step. It is not the end of the road. It is a new beginning in one of the most complex challenges of our time, but it is also a challenge to our political, social and economic gains and to the principle of human dignity. That is the reason we are here.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Macky Sall, President of the Republic of Senegal.

President Sall (spoke in French): The issue that brings us together today is of vital importance. It is estimated that there are more than 65 million internally displaced persons, refugees or migrants. The phenomenon of migration is certainly not new, but today it has been exacerbated by the effects of war and other sources of instability, which are related to insecurity and the severity of climatic conditions in some parts of the globe. It is not easy to deal with that issue. Beyond conventional wisdom, only a calm, coordinated and comprehensive approach can resolve such a complex problem.

Senegal is hosting a number of African and non-African communities. It also has a large diaspora around the world. We are therefore particularly sensitive to the issue of how migrants are treated by host countries. All migrants, all persons who are refugees, requires treatment that respects their dignity and fundamental human rights, regardless of where they come from.

Senegal recognizes and commends the efforts of all those countries that are hosting refugees. The opening of their doors and the granting of asylum to fellow human beings who have been forced to leave their countries in order to save their lives is a great sign of the humanity of those countries. At the same time, we must also ensure that the situation being faced by migrants who have been living in their host countries for many years is not called into question by the temporary situation of refugees. In many cases, migrants are good people who work hard to make a living and thereby contribute to the economic and social development of their host country. Many of them have also established homes where they live with their families; therefore, the same human values underpinning the welcome for refugees mean that we must also respect migrants' rights.

The two requirements are not mutually exclusive. Rather than a systematic policy of returning migrants, Senegal believes that the situation of migrants should be stabilized, which should be done through the appropriate regularization of their status. It is also a priority to work towards lasting solutions to the clandestine flow of migrants. That requires a strong and ongoing battle against criminal networks promoting clandestine migration, including through the enhanced means that have been authorized under Security Council resolution 2240 (2015), of 9 October 2015.

The partnership between Europe and Africa in that context — and Senegal is a participant in that effort — has to that end come up with very successful outcomes. We seek to stabilize the political and institutional situation in transit countries, because when a State is fragile or non-existent, those networks prosper and benefit from the chaos of an absent State authority. It is up to other States to implement appropriate policies that can give young people reasons to hope, which involve education and training and the provision of jobs and revenue-generating activities. By responding to the problems of youth and revitalizing those zones from which potential migrants come and facilitating projects to provide basic social services, we will be able to deal effectively with the deep roots of the migration phenomenon.

In conclusion, I must express Senegal's concern at the possibility that detention centres could be established in African countries. That question merits serious consideration in the light of the rules that govern the rights of persons and their assets in integrated areas, such as in the Economic Community of West African States.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Majesty King Don Felipe VI of the Kingdom of Spain.

King Felipe VI (spoke in Spanish): At the outset, allow me to express the appreciation of the Kingdom of Spain at seeing this high-level meeting convened on the major movements of migrant flows. Great movements of people are a sign of our times. A good part of humankind finds itself forced to displace itself: 75 million refugees and internally displaced persons are fleeing conflicts, terrorism or persecution. Specifically, many of those people are knocking on the doors of Europe. Our responsibility is to welcome them, subject to our capacity, so that they can lead a dignified life. They have been expelled by force from their homes, and they need to know that they can count on our support to meet their needs and that they can exercise and, above all, realize their right to return to their homeland.

However, that return necessarily means that conflicts must come to an end, terrorism must be defeated, and inclusive and democratic societies must be established where the fundamental rights to life and liberty are respected. As a non-permanent member of the Security Council and as a committed member of the international community, Spain will continue working to ensure that this is the case. This high-level meeting should not be understood as an isolated event. Today, we are implementing a process that will require the ongoing efforts of everyone for a very long period of time. So I now declare the full preparedness of the Kingdom of Spain to work as hard as we can to prepare and negotiate the two global conventions on migrants and refugees that need to be adopted for 2018.

Spain hopes that it can be a relevant actor in a matter of enormous ethical and humanitarian importance. Spain, given its historical role as a geographic crossroads, is very well aware of the situation. The societies of today and tomorrow are, and will be, diverse from an ethnic, cultural and religious point of view. That unavoidable fact must also be made compatible with the respect for the values that should be observed in the host countries. Therefore, the migratory flows, if they are correctly managed, should have a clearly positive effect on the host societies. In the matter of the management of such huge movements of people, Spain has experience that has delivered good results. It is based on the guarantee of the protection of people and an intense and sustained effort to cooperate with the countries where the migrants come from, as well as the transit countries.

Spain's attitude has always been inspired by its willingness to lessen this human drama of major scale. We have to fight in a coordinated manner against human traffickers and human trafficking. We must provide international protection to those who justly request asylum, and we need to offer our support and show our solidarity and assistance to the transit and host countries for refugees. We must promote the integration of refugees and the legal means for emigration. That shared responsibility is the fundamental pillar that should be at the core of the solution that affects us all and that nobody can solve individually.

I conclude by thanking the Secretary-General for convening this meeting, which represents a good response to the General Assembly's decision to concentrate international efforts on great migration flows. We are sure that the results of this meeting will mark a crucial turning point on this matter of such vital transcendence, whose moral and political implications require a special demonstration of determination, generosity and perseverance.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: I now give the floor to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Paraguay.

Mr. Loizaga Lezcano (Paraguay) (spoke in Spanish): Today we are meeting while faced with the troubling reality of the greatest refugee crisis since the Second World War. For the Republic of Paraguay, the current refugee crisis is, above all, a humanitarian and political crisis, in which human beings are struggling to survive, escaping from terrorist activities, leaving their homes and trying to escape from armed conflicts, violence, persecution and blind intolerance. These people, who board unseaworthy vessels, often place themselves at great risk. They include women, children and the elderly, and, regardless of their race, religion or origin, deserve the protection of the States Members of the United Nations.

We call for humanitarian assistance for these people, whose rights are fully protected by the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951. We reiterate the conviction that if the deep-rooted causes of the problem are not dealt with by the countries affected, the crisis will continue and even risk worsening. Similarly, the refugee crisis has been intensified by the massive migration phenomena that are occurring in various parts of the world, including thousands of Latin Americans and unaccompanied children. We reiterate that these are people who are seeking new opportunities in whatever country they can find them, opportunities to which they are entitled under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. They have equality under the law, irrespective of who they are, and we emphasize that the protection of anyone's human rights, including migrants' rights, can never be denied on the grounds of their status as migrants.

Like all countries in the Americas, the Republic of Paraguay has welcomed a large number of migrants from the most diverse parts of the world throughout its long history. A few days ago in Paraguay, we celebrated the eightieth anniversary of the first Japanese migration. That migration has contributed positively and significantly to the development of the country. Today, we have communities that have integrated into our society, having adopted Paraguayan culture and enriched it with their traditions and customs from their countries of origin, and they form an integral part of the cultural and socioeconomic life of our country. Thousands of Paraguayan migrants who, for various reasons, have moved to a number of countries in the world have contributed through their work and sacrifices to the economic growth and cultural diversity in their adoptive countries.

My country's experience teaches us that the movement of persons is most plural and diverse when individuals are included in national plans and programmes. We therefore advocate the promotion of safe, organized and regular migration, and we are among the States that implement migration policies that ensure adequate conditions for transit and safe and dignified shelter, including the means for regularizing the status of migrants. Undoubtedly, regularizing the status of migrants will contribute to the full implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development.

We are convinced that only through an in-depth understanding of the migration process can we face the problem with fewer fears and prejudices. We vigorously oppose all forms of discrimination, racism, xenophobia and any other kind of intolerance with regard to refugees and migrants. We believe that establishing a space for dialogue within the Organization for debating the challenges of international migration, as illustrated by the adoption this morning of the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), is a major step forward.

The entire international community must assume that joint responsibility and develop a proper response, while always respecting the human rights of migrants.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The General Assembly will now hear a statement by His Excellency Mr. Antoni Martí Petit, Prime Minister of the Principality of Andorra.

Mr. Martí Petit (Andorra) (spoke in Spanish): The major displacement of refugees and migrants represents one of the major challenges facing us today. We have witnessed it in its various tragic iterations in recent years along the borders of Europe because of the conflict in Syria. But this is not a new phenomenon. The history of humankind is full of great migrations.

That same history show us that, in general, migrations represent a positive phenomenon that has contributed to improving both the host countries and the countries of origin. Andorra has had its own experience in that area. During the nineteenth century, many Andorrans found in migration a solution to the poverty in which they were living in Andorra, a mountainous country based on a subsistence economy.

In the twentieth century, especially after the Second World War, that tendency was reversed, and Andorra became a host society for thousands of migrants originating mainly from other European countries. Without the influx of those people, the large economic growth of Andorra over the past 70 years would not have been possible. At the same time, Andorra is proud of having given opportunities for advancement to so many families.

Beyond the economic incentives for promoting emigration, Andorra has also historically welcomed political or war refugees with open arms. During the Spanish Civil War, Andorra gave refuge to both sides of the conflict, and during the Second World War our country provided a route of escape for Jewish families fleeing the Nazi regime and for Allied pilots from occupied France. True to our tradition of hospitality, the Government of Andorra is currently working on introducing legislation to regularize situations of provisional asylum. That detail seems important to me, because despite their similarities, the situation of refugees and that of migrants differ in significant ways. The situation of the migrant is one in which he or she is seeking a better future by coming to a country, integrating into a new community and exercising his or her rights and responsibilities as a new citizen.

The situation of refugees is different and, in the majority of cases, much more desperate. In the case of refugees, we, as the international community, have the duty not only to offer asylum and protect their human rights, but also to make it possible for those people — who are fleeing war, intolerance and persecution — to return one day to live in their countries of origin as full citizens.

While the two situations are different, they also have points in common. In both cases, the international community — and every country that is a part of it — must ensure the rights and dignity of displaced persons. We must prevent their desperation and state of need from becoming exploited, as is currently happening through the actions of criminal organizations that traffic in human beings.

Once again, all of these questions must be addressed from a perspective that can be nothing other than global. We must have an international regulation that ensures the rights of displaced persons and manages migration flows. It must be a regulation that allows migratory movements to continue to have a positive impact on our global society, as has always been the case throughout the history of humankind.

Today, here in New York, we have taken a small step forward. However, the most important step is yet to be taken, that is, to move from words to deeds.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Petro Poroshenko, President of Ukraine.

President Poroshenko: First, let me commend this extremely important and timely endeavour. Humankind is being tested by unprecedented waves of refugees and the migrant crisis. Approximately 250 million people have been driven by way of various fates to flee their homes. But they are united by the same hope, namely, to live in security and with dignity. The global crisis requires our shared responsibility and concerted effort. Today I would like to express my strong solidarity with those who have been forced to abandon their homes against their will.

Foreign aggression and State-sponsored terrorism are the enemies of humankind in many parts of the world. Unfortunately, my country has also been affected by that problem. Russian armed aggression has forced almost 1.8 million Ukrainians to seek a new home within the country, placing Ukraine among the top 10 countries experiencing internal displacement. So far, we have consistently demonstrated our commitment to protect all of them. An appropriate framework was established to, among other things, guarantee their social needs and provide access to health care, education and employment. Our determination has prevented an additional significant influx of refugees into other parts of Europe. Let me thank all of our governmental and humanitarian partners for standing by Ukraine during this challenging time of need. However, we cannot maintain a responsive stance. We need a lasting solution to end the Russian aggression against Ukraine.

The outcome of this high-level meeting could provide hope to millions of people. The New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) provides us with an inclusive framework for further cooperation in coordinating our efforts. It rightly addresses the key issue of human mobility, including the need to combat xenophobia, discrimination and human trafficking. Ukraine was one of the first European countries to criminalize human trafficking, back in 1998. Let me also emphasize the appeal for adequate humanitarian financing to bridge the gap in funding humanitarian needs.

We also welcome the fact that the Declaration has established the foundation to address the needs of internally displaced persons. It is our political and moral obligation to protect and support them.

It is also time to re-establish the position of Special Representative of the Secretary-General on internally displaced persons. However, all of our efforts will be in vain unless the very origins of such displacement are addressed, namely, foreign aggression and the violation of international law.

We have no right to turn a blind eye to Russia's bombardment of civilian facilities in Aleppo, Syria, or in Donbas, Ukraine. That concerns not only compliance with human rights principles, but also the responsibility of the State that is violating international law and the fundamental freedoms of civilians and forcing them to leave their homes. We need an international mechanism on responsibility as soon as possible, together with a binding international framework to protect the rights of internally displaced persons.

In conclusion, I would like to urge the international community to redouble its efforts in facilitating the resolution of conflicts based on the norms and principles of international law. That is the only way to shape a sustainable solution to one of the most painful problems facing humankind.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The General Assembly will now hear a statement by His Excellency Mr. Enele Sosene Sopoaga, Prime Minister of Tuvalu.

Mr. Sopoaga (Tuvalu): My country, Tuvalu, is very pleased and honoured to contribute to this high-level debate on possible solutions to the issue of large movements of refugees and migrants. I would first like to register Tuvalu's sincere thanks to the Secretary-General for his determination and his comprehensive report entitled "The road to dignity by 2030: ending poverty, transforming all lives and protecting the planet" (A/69/700). The stage has been set for us the leaders here at the United Nations, because the issue has come to light so many times. The plight of people displaced by conflict, disaster or the impact of climate change has frequently dominated media narratives and United Nations debates and formed part of our Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) — Agenda 2030.

The realities of the multiple crises involving conflict, violence and disaster have captivated our imagination and generated urgent discourses on possible responses, including for those displaced within countries or beyond borders for temporary or protracted periods. As the United Nations family, we must respond. We must hear the call and respond to the monumental crisis with monumental solidarity and commitment and the necessary political will. Our response to large movements of people must be grounded in shared values of humanitarian responsibility. Long-term solutions should be found for the sake of the safety and dignity of migrants and refugees, as well as for that of originating and receiving countries and communities.

Whether people are internally displaced or beyond the boundaries of their citizenship, many move to escape armed conflict, human-caused conflict, political conflict, religious persecution, poverty, food insecurity, terrorism or human rights violations and abuses. Some move in search of new economic prospects and opportunities. Others, including in my own country, do so in response to the adverse impacts of climate change or because of the effects of sea-level rise and climate change. The United Nations must hear and come to the rescue of those people and provide assurances of security in relation to livelihood and survival. We must reach out to those people in their time of need. We are grateful to, and very encouraged by, host countries and individuals that have continued to demonstrate leadership and a willingness to accept migrants and refugees. We commend our neighbour, the Republic of Nauru, for offering to contribute in that regard.

There is also a call to recognize that we belong to the same family. As a Tuvaluan elder has said, we are all human beings, made in the image of God. So let us build bridges, not walls or defences. When managed properly, accepting refugees is a win-win solution for everyone. Refugees are famously devoted to education and self-reliance, as we all know. They bring new skills and dynamism into aging workforces. As migrants, however, it is also importance that we show respect for the laws of the countries that receive us, and that we do not impose or transfer new laws or values to host countries.

It is also critical that this dialogue take into account the fact that some people will be forced to move by the adverse effects of climate change, particularly those who live in small island low-lying countries such as my own, Tuvalu, in the Pacific, and those in the Caribbean, the Indian Ocean and other regions especially vulnerable to climate change. We must take them into account, too, and make sure that we provide for the protection of such people, displaced or likely to be displaced by the impact of climate change. That is well recognized in the SDGs, and the challenge is that we take action as soon as possible.

As we know, recent studies suggest that an average of 22.5 million people are displaced every year by the effects of climate change and other climate- or weather-related disasters. That is equivalent to 62,000 people being displaced every day by climate change, particularly sea-level rise. We will be introducing a draft resolution calling for a legal framework to take into account the protection and the rights of such people. Their rights must be protected when they are forced to migrate across country, and their security and survival must be assured under international law and the umbrella of the United Nations family. I am pleased to be able to say that we will be working with other members of the Organization to advance that draft resolution. I will be seeking the support of the members of the international community here.

In conclusion, we also need to take into account the main outcomes of the World Humanitarian Summit, just recently concluded in Istanbul, in order to further our progress in dealing with movements of migrants and refugees. With that, Tuvalu also warmly welcomes the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), and I commit my country to working in solidarity with the United Nations to advance it.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: I should remind speakers that we have agreed on a four-minute limit to statements.

I now call on His Excellency Mr. Rimbink Pato, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Immigration of the Independent State of Papua New Guinea.

Mr. Pato (Papua New Guinea): On behalf of my country, I thank the Secretary-General and the President of the General Assembly for today's important high-level meeting, which is a critical step in the right direction. We are grateful to the United Nations for the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants, adopted earlier this morning (see A/71/PV.3) as resolution 71/1. I would like to describe the experience of my own country, Papua New Guinea.

We are hosting a total of 1,007 refugees and other migrants from around the world at a regional resettlement facility on Manus Island and in other parts of the country. Of that total, 671 are prima facie refugees, 204 are asylum-seekers and 132 are migrants. The majority of them — 563 of the refugees — have refused resettlement in Papua New Guinea, and third countries are being sought for their placement, while 72 have decided to make Papua New Guinea their home. We are also in the final stages of addressing the asylum-seekers among the more than 20,000 other people who have sought refuge in Papua New Guinea outside the Manus Island asylum-seeker centre.

The Manus Island processing facility was established based on our country's humanitarian gesture of goodwill and in recognition of our international human rights obligations. The centre has not been without controversy, but it is also a demonstration of the bilateral and regional cooperation that we have maintained with Australia and other partners since 2012, in order to address not only the issue of refugees and migrants but also the despicable acts of people-smuggling and human trafficking for profit conducted by criminals and other syndicates around the world. Papua New Guinea is in the process of closing the facility on Manus Island owing to a ruling by our Supreme Court that the centre is unconstitutional. Its current residents are therefore allowed to move freely around Manus Island and are encouraged to prepare for resettlement in Papua New Guinea. Their human rights are also recognized and respected by Papua New Guineans.

As an island country, Papua New Guinea is also concerned about the security implications of climate change, including rising sea levels, coastal erosion and ocean acidification, which will inevitably lead to a forced mass displacement of peoples and communities. For us, many lives and livelihoods, particularly in the agricultural and fisheries sectors, are dependent upon the health of our environment. However, changing weather patterns and losses in biodiversity may leave many with low yields and thus a need to migrate to other areas in order to assure for themselves sustainable livelihoods, security and a future. Climate refugees are no longer an abstract notion; they are already emerging in my own country in the case of the Carteret Islands.

We must work together in order to effectively combat climate change, and we call on all countries to sign and ratify the Paris Agreement, so as to ensure that it enters into force as soon as possible. It is a measure essential to ensuring that we act in concert in order to deal with the major climate crisis facing our world today. Papua New Guinea will be lodging its instrument of ratification this week.

Today's meeting should rise above mere rhetoric to provide lasting and meaningful pathways and actions for overcoming the challenges of mass movements of refugees and migrants worldwide, which have unfortunately now become a serious global humanitarian crisis and are also threatening global peace and security. We cannot afford to let it spiral out of control. No country is immune to it, and the implications are wide-ranging and far-reaching, not only for those particularly innocent children on the move, but also for transit and destination countries. This is a global problem and it must be acted upon in a comprehensive and concerted manner.

As Papua New Guinea is a resource-challenged country, our national experience in hosting migrants and refugees and providing for their needs is not a simple issue. Shared global responsibility in this area is therefore most important. This is why Papua New Guinea is serious and committed to being part of the global solution to this issue and therefore welcomes and supports the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants adopted today (resolution 71/1).

The key to stemming the tide of migrant and refugee exodus from the countries of origin is to address the fundamental root causes that trigger such movements of people in the world. Any measures taken must put the human rights of migrants at the forefront of all considerations. There also be serious consideration given to holding countries of origin accountable for the exodus of their peoples.

We need to strengthen strategic partnerships within a mutually supportive and global and regional system. We must work together to consolidate the various international standards on migration into a single framework, which would ultimate strengthen international cooperation. I think the work has started this morning with the adoption of the New York Declaration. We must address the smuggling of people and trafficking in humans by combating criminal networks, prosecuting perpetrators and protecting the victims and ensuring their future security.

In conclusion, we need to scale up our activities in the areas of data capacity-building and disaggregated migration data at all levels in order to effectively track down and monitor population movements as well as the criminals who benefit from the smuggling of people and the trafficking in humans. This will help us in showing causes and patterns of migration that can be used to inform migration law, policy and responses in countries of origin, transit and destination.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: I would remind delegations once again that speakers should limit their remarks to four minutes.

The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Robert Mugabe, President of the Republic of Zimbabwe.

President Mugabe: Over the past year, we have witnessed harrowing images of refugees risking their lives to flee the dire realities in their countries of origin. We have been equally shocked at the hostile reception refugees have often been subjected to. Against this backdrop, we are pleased at the convening of today's important meeting that allows us to explore a collective blueprint for dealing with large movements of refugees and migrants. We are also pleased that the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) highlights the importance of addressing the root causes of large movements of people.

The movement of people from one place to another is not a new phenomenon at all. Migration has been a fact of life from time immemorial. However, it is their magnitude and the highly interconnected nature of our world today that makes these movements an unprecedented phenomenon. While this very interconnectedness has been viewed with apprehension in some quarters, we are convinced that it gives us an opportunity to come together and forge sustainable strategies in a much more effective manner than could have been done in our previously unconnected world. Indeed, how we choose to address the issue of large movements of refugees and migrants will have a significant bearing on the realization of our collective goals as enshrined in the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. This is why today's meeting and the outcomes it has adopted are so crucial.

We have noted that a large number of the refugees that have landed on European shores originated from countries in armed conflict, such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya and Syria. We are therefore convinced that the return to the ideals of saving succeeding generations from the scourge of war and refraining from the use of armed force, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, is critical in addressing the root causes of large movements of refugees.

Apart from natural disasters, large-scale movements are in great measure a result of direct acts of commission and omission by humankind. As a result, more effort must be exerted towards the peaceful settlement of disputes under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. More often than not, Member States have been too willing to resort to force without exhausting peaceful means. Hegemonic military doctrines and adventurism, fuelled by a desire to achieve the narrow national interests of a powerful few, are at the root of the proliferation of the armed conflicts that have spawned so many refugees to date.

Some recent efforts to combat terrorism have tended to trample upon the rights of migrant communities and refugees. While States have a legitimate right to take appropriate measures to protect their citizens from terrorism, there is a great risk of their mimicking the very same terrorist scourge. Should we in the process disregard and wantonly violate their fundamental rights?

The 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development recognizes the positive contribution that migrants make to inclusive growth and sustainable development. As we gain traction in the implementation of the Agenda, we should therefore be wary of a rising tendency by some unscrupulous individuals to stoke the fires of xenophobia and promote negative narratives of migrants for political expediency. We have a collective responsibility to change that narrative on migrants and migration in our countries. Many countries owe some of the success in business and scientific prowess to the invaluable contributions of migrants and refugees. We commend those States that have, despite their own limitations, opened their borders to migrant communities.

We in Zimbabwe have hosted many refugees from conflict-affected countries. We call for a balanced focus on the humanitarian plight of migrants and refugees the world over. It is our sincere hope that implementation of the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants that we have adopted today will culminate in a comprehensive and sustainable collective response to this shared challenge and promote burden-sharing. We are also encouraged by the adoption of the two annexes that seek to take us towards a comprehensive refugee response framework and a global compact for safe, orderly and regular migration. As we move towards operationalizing these frameworks, we call for continued adherence to the principles of national ownership and leadership above all else.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: The Assembly will now hear a statement by His Royal Highness Prince Mohammed bin Nawwaf bin Abdulaziz Al Saud, Crown Prince of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

Prince Al Saud (Kingdom of Saudi Arabia) (spoke in Arabic): The crisis of refugees arising from ethnic conflicts and disputes requires that we combine our efforts in order to address that crisis harmoniously and to limit its impact on humankind. Saudi Arabia is dealing with this issue inspired by the teachings of Islam, which call for security, peace and providing assistance to those who are in need.

In demonstration of the humanitarian role assumed by the Kingdom since its founding by King Abdulaziz, the country has worked to lay the foundations of humanitarian assistance, so that Saudi Arabia ranks third among countries globally in terms of humanitarian aid and development assistance. The assistance provided by the Kingdom over the past four decades totals $139 billion. As the Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques, King Salman bin Abdelaziz Al Saud has maintained this assistance to all countries in need. We established the King Salman Humanitarian Aid and Relief Centre to reflect the commitment of Saudi Arabia to providing assistance at the global level.

Since the eruption of the crisis in Syria, the Kingdom has been the foremost provider of assistance to the Syrian people to alleviate their humanitarian suffering. We host 2.5 million Syrians, treat them as refugees and put them in refugee camps to ensure their safety and dignity. They are allowed full freedom of movement, and the hundreds of thousands of refugees who wished to stay in the Kingdom have been granted permanent residency, work permits and free medical care. A total of 140,000 Syrian students have been hosted and given free schooling. We have also provided care for millions of Syrian refugees in the refugee communities.

In addition, our brethren, Yemeni refugees in Saudi Arabia, are treated as visitors and provided with freedom of movement, the right to work and to bring their families. A total of 285,000 Yemeni students have received a free public education in Saudi Arabia. The value of assistance provided by the Kingdom recently to Yemeni refugees in Djibouti and Somalia totals more than $4.2 billion. We recently provided $500 million in response to the humanitarian and relief needs of the Yemeni people.

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia believes that the first and primary step for cooperation and dealing with those crises is to intensify efforts to resolve disputes under the Charter of the United Nations by using proactive diplomacy in order to end crises and not allow them to spiral out of control. The Kingdom will continue to work tirelessly with international organizations and countries that believe in collective work in order to achieve peace and international security and maintain the goodwill of humankind around the globe.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: I now give the floor to Sheikh Mohammed bin Abdulrahman bin Jassim Al-Thani, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Qatar.

Sheikh Al-Thani (Qatar) (spoke in Arabic): It is a pleasure for me to thank both Presidents of the General Assembly at its seventieth and seventy-first sessions for their efforts and hard work in preparing this meeting today. We also thank the Secretary-General for his ongoing support and efforts.

This meeting is taking place during a period of increasing conflicts and humanitarian crises in the world, which have led to unprecedented waves of refugees. The images of boats filled with refugees who are fleeing areas of poverty and conflict remains etched in our minds. These images make us weep. We have seen utter disregard for human rights and international law. It is regrettable that women and children, the elderly and the handicapped are also among the refugees. We cannot close our eyes to such massive violations of human rights. We must insist that they receive assistance, in line with the customs of international treaties. The international community today agrees that any effort to find sustainable solutions to the refugee and migrant humanitarian crisis must be based on cooperation to ensure a comprehensive vision of how to address the root causes of these problems so that we can provide a life of dignity for these populations.

We must insist on urgently finding political solutions to these conflicts. We do not take the burden that is placed on the countries that host these migrants and refugees lightly. Therefore, we ask everyone to cooperate in addressing the consequences of these humanitarian crises. We also need to focus on the root causes that lead to xenophobia, which can be very dangerous within the host communities. In that regard, we believe that we must find ways of protecting human rights.

Education is one of the most serious issues we must grapple with, because refugees face a lack of education during their movements. Refugees under 18 years of age are suffering the consequences of being deprived of an education. We need to have special programmes set up for that category of refugees, under the framework of urgent assistance. There is consensus that the refugee crisis we face today is the result of continuing conflicts.

Qatar has warned against the conflicts in the Arab region and their disastrous impact on peace and international safety and security. These conflicts have also led to major flows of refugees from the region. Nevertheless, the region also hosts 2.2 per cent of refugees from all over the world. Qatar reiterates the need for international cooperation in finding long-term solutions to these problems instead of quick fixes. Any solution must be long-term and in line with the Charter of the United Nations and its provisions on the settlement of conflicts by peaceful means and mediation, which has proven to be extremely efficient. Qatar has direct experience in that regard.

The Arab region is also suffering from decades-long refugee problems. The apparently recent phenomenon of displacement has in fact endured throughout the seven decades of Israel's occupation of Palestine. That practice has been deemed illegal and undermined the peace and security of the Palestinians.

The world needs to concentrate on finding a sustainable and equitable solution, in line with international treaties. The fact that millions of refugees and displaced persons are fleeing Syria today is the inevitable consequence of the deteriorating humanitarian situation there and is due to the fact that there are no effective measures to halt the crimes committed against the citizens. Therefore, we must find a political solution to the Syrian crisis that will bring about peace and stability and safeguard the inalienable rights of our Syrian brothers.

We must find sustainable solutions to the area's crises. The responsibility of Qatar towards the people of Syria is reflected in the fact that in 2011 we gave $1.7 billion — $900 million through Government networks, $150 million through civil society organization and dozens of millions through specialized agencies such as the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

The figure of 20,000 Syrian refugees is already outdated; we now host 45,000. We have issued 7,000 visas to help them join their families in Doha. Between 2012 and 2015, 600,000 children benefited from our assistance. We must implement the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. We remind everyone of the importance of finding the political will within the international community to establish efficient measures that will meet their basic needs. We must do so without any discrimination and with full respect of everyone's human rights.

Finally, we do hope that the meeting will achieve tangible results in order to address the very roots of the problems that refugees and migrants face and to provide them with humanitarian assistance so they can have a life of dignity. Otherwise, we will be unable to achieve global lasting solutions.

Co-Chair Lykketoft: I would like to remind speakers to speak slowly and to limit their statements to four minutes.

The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Juan Carlos Varela Rodríguez, President of Panama.

President Varela Rodríguez (spoke in Spanish): On behalf of the people and Government of the Republic of Panama, it is an honour to participate in this plenary meeting to share our experiences in addressing the migration crisis in our region.

Irregular migratory flows continue to be one of the most significant challenges for the international community. Panama and the rest of the American continent cannot escape the global migrant and refugee crisis. The geographical characteristics of my country make us a bridge that connects the North and South of the continent. Every year, over 30,000 migrants risk their lives crossing our country in an attempt to reach countries in the North. Their migration is primarily due to socioeconomic reasons. In considering the issue, it is essential that all migration policies be based on safeguarding the most fundamental human right — the right to life. History has shown that migration cannot be stemmed but it can be adequately regulated to ensure orderly and secure flows, thereby bolstering global justice and equity via remittances, which serve to redistribute wealth.

Irregular migratory flows have two faces: a humanitarian face reflected in the families that abandon their country in search of a better future, and a criminal face reflected in the human trafficking networks. Aware of that reality, we launched Operation Controlled Flow two months ago, through which migrants from other regions who enter our national territory in vulnerable conditions are provided with humanitarian care and are subject to strict health, migration and security controls.

We, the States members of the international community, should focus our attention on the reasons for such migrations and redouble our efforts to address the problems that drive our brothers to leave their countries. On the American continent specifically, we are very concerned about the situation in Haiti, where every State has been called on to support the successful completion of the electoral process, thereby strengthening the country's democratic institutions and economy. After the 2010 earthquake, thousands of Haitians emigrated to Brazil on humanitarian visas. In the wake of the effects of the economic downturn in our South American brother nation, they then decided to migrate northward, creating a humanitarian crisis in our region that is worsening daily. Panama will continue to work to responsibly address the humanitarian issues arising from this, but we need better coordination among all the countries involved to resolve the problem. We call respectfully for a rethinking of migration policies on such flows across the continent and for the sharing of information on migrants' records of entry into our countries for both humanitarian and security reasons.

Mr. Rahming (Bahamas), Acting Co-Chair, took the Chair.

On the other hand, the rapprochement between the Governments of Cuba and the United States is beginning to show very positive results. We hope that this new aspect of the foreign policies of the two countries will continue to evolve towards complete normalization of their bilateral economic relations and the migration flows of citizens between them. The improved relations between Cuba and the United States are an excellent example of how diplomacy can help to improve migration flows and protect the lives of all those who try to migrate.

Panama affirms its commitment to treating migrants humanely, combating criminal networks that traffic in persons, rigorously enforcing our laws on migration while respecting human rights, and continuing to work actively with the international community to find a holistic and permanent solution to the issue.

The Acting Co-Chair: The General Assembly will now hear a statement by His Excellency Mr. Perry Christie, Prime Minister and Minister of Finance of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas.

Mr. Christie (Bahamas): I would like to express my gratitude to the Secretary-General for his leadership on the issue of migrants and refugees. The phenomenon of large movements of refugees and migrants has reached an unprecedented level of complexity and challenge. A global consensus on how to deal with it is urgently needed. The Bahamas therefore welcomes the efforts now under way to develop a common understanding on how best to effectively address and manage such movements.

While discussions of migration tend to focus on the negative aspects of irregular migration, we in the Bahamas, because of our own historical experience with large movements of migrants, are acutely mindful of the positive contributions that can sometimes result from regular migration, and of the considerable benefits to both the sending and receiving countries. Such benefits include economic development, cultural cross-fertilization and the promotion of State-to-State cooperation in managing matters of common concern. At the same time, however, it is imperative that we move in earnest towards the development of a comprehensive approach to irregular migration, one that focuses in particular on the underlying causes that motivate so many people to risk their lives and that those of their children in search of a better life in other countries.

The Bahamas, a country of some 400,000 people, constantly deals with large groups of irregular migrants entering it. People come to us in their thousands from Haiti. We continue to receive migrants from Cuba, more recently in larger numbers. That is unsustainable and presents both economic and social challenges for the Bahamas. We are working with the Governments of both these two countries to manage those challenges, and in the case of Cuba, migration talks are scheduled to resume in December. The immigration policies of the Bahamas are designed to protect the national security interests and social welfare of Bahamians as well as possible, while respecting the human rights and dignity of migrants and refugees.

We can no longer act as if it is business as usual. A more concerted effort must be made by all of us to manage irregular migration. In particular, we must stop criminal enterprises from benefiting from irregular migration. We must acknowledge the more aggressive elements involved, including those who use migration as a cover for trafficking in drugs, arms and persons. I therefore call on the United Nations and regional bodies to put in place a mechanism for comprehensively addressing irregular migration and its impact, particularly on small island States such as the Bahamas.

The Bahamas is fully committed to the implementation and promotion of the migrant-related mandates of international and regional agreements to which we are a State party. Indeed, over the years we have enacted legislative and policy measures aimed at providing protection and support to regular and irregular migrants alike, including refugees entering our territory. I say again, however, that we must collectively consider the impacts of those who would misuse such procedures as a shield for unlawful behaviour, and to apply international laws and treaties accordingly.

The Bahamas welcomes the outcomes of today's meeting. They reflect the complex array of issues surrounding refugees and migration, and the equally complex responses that are needed for the regularization of large movements of refugees and migrants. We are particularly pleased to see that attention has been given to the need to alleviate some of the burden placed on migrant recipient countries such as the Bahamas. We look forward to future bilateral, regional and multilateral engagement based on that principle. More generally, the Bahamas welcomes the calls for increased support from international, regional and multilateral stakeholders for countries of origin, transit and destination. We must all agree on the urgent need to address the root causes of the problem that has brought us all together for this high-level meeting.

I would like to conclude by assuring all Member States of the ongoing and vigorous support of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas for all of the initiatives under way and pending in our common quest to address the large-scale movement of refugees and migrants.

The Acting Co-Chair: The General Assembly will now hear a statement by Her Excellency Sheikh Hasina, Prime Minister of the People's Republic of Bangladesh.

Sheikh Hasina (Bangladesh): I would like to commend the Secretary-General for convening the first-ever summit on refugees and migrants. We must seize this historic opportunity and deliver on a robust, ambitious and action-oriented blueprint for dealing with population movements. That must be done within a broader development context.

Migration is a public good. It must be appreciated as a reality and a freedom enhancer. In a connected world, goods, services and all sectors of production need to be able to move unhindered. The spread and speed of knowledge and technology make it even more compelling across economies and societies. Let me underline a few aspects of migration governance.

Mr. Bouah-Kamon (Côte d'Ivoire), Acting Co-Chair, took the Chair.

First, mutual trust and respect, shared responsibility and inclusiveness are critical in addressing migration comprehensively. We must have general agreement on these universal principles.

Secondly, we pledge to leave no one behind. Migrants' rights have to be secured in all situations, irrespective of their status. For harmony across our diverse societies, the protection and promotion of the rights of migrants and refugees are equally essential.

Thirdly, migration and mobility need to be placed in a new, positive narrative. Bangladesh has therefore proposed a global compact on migration addressing some of the long-standing gaps in migration governance. The compact must build on the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development and capture elements and modalities that are ambitious and enforceable, yet balanced and flexible.

Fourthly, the promotion of tolerance and understanding is crucial for accommodating migrants and refugees. We must all rise above a solely identity-based discourse.

Fifthly, climate change and the resultant displacement of millions of people are a reality. The compact will have to take into account the protection needs of millions of climate-displaced people. The World Humanitarian Summit adopted the Partnership for Protection and Development, and the global compact should build on such innovative initiatives.

Promoting safe, orderly, regular and responsible movement of people is about securing individuals' dignity and well-being. Bangladesh, as the current Chair of the Global Forum on Migration and Development, will be happy to contribute to the development of the compact.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): The Assembly will now hear a statement by His Excellency Mr. Nawaz Sharif, Prime Minister of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

Mr. Sharif (Pakistan): We welcome this historic high-level meeting on the large-scale movement of refugees and migrants, which is among the most urgent humanitarian challenges of our times. We are meeting at a critical juncture as the number of people forcibly displaced from their homes reaches a record high and human suffering is at an unprecedented level. Much of this displacement has been neither voluntary nor orderly. People have been fleeing desperate conditions of conflict, war or poverty. These helpless people on the move deserve compassion and humane treatment. For millions of such people across the world, this high-level meeting offers the promise of hope. We must not fail them.

We have taken a momentous step today. By adopting the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), we are reforming our commitment to refugee and migrant communities across the world. The challenge now is to translate this noble initiative into reality.

The large influx of refugees and migrants to Europe has brought renewed focus to their plight. The shocking images of refugees in flight across the Mediterranean have shaken the conscience of the world, yet the true scale of this crisis lies beyond these headlines. It is the developing countries, including Pakistan, that continue to be at the forefront of bearing the burden of large-scale global human displacements.

Many of these protracted displacement situations have created complex political, socioeconomic, security and environmental challenges for host countries and local communities. It is time for the international community to forge a comprehensive global compact on the large-scale movement of refugees and migrants. The compact should be based on fair and equitable burden-sharing and aim to ensure that the displaced do not become victims of xenophobic attitudes and political expediency. The compact should also provide greater avenues for legal migration and take a realistic view of the situation. The comprehensive refugee response framework, adopted along with the New York Declaration, provides a useful starting point. We must build on this momentum. Going forward, we must also address the root causes of displacement and forced migration. Unless we resolutely put out the fires that have caused so much suffering, we will not be able to find a long-term solution to this crisis.

For nearly four decades, Pakistan has served as a generous host to millions of Afghan refugees. This is the largest protracted refugee situation in the world; even today, we are hosting over 2.5 million refugees in Pakistan. Despite our modest resources, the people of Pakistan have opened their hearts to their Afghan brothers and sisters. While financial support from the international community has waned, Pakistan's hospitality has not. Pakistan supports a safe and dignified return for all Afghan refugees to their homeland in a sustainable manner. We count on the active support of our Afghan brothers and international partners in creating an environment conducive to achieving this outcome. We hope that the international community will step forward and provide the necessary resources to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in a timely manner so as to support the sustainable return and reintegration of the Afghan refugees.

Sixty-five years ago, the architects of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees gathered here in New York. We had a pious hope that the foundation they laid would have a value that exceeded its contractual scope. In setting a normative standard to promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, today we have a similar opportunity to help create a world where no one is left behind in our shared quest for human dignity.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): The Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Christian Kern, Federal Chancellor of Austria.

Mr. Kern (Austria): Let me first thank the Secretary-General and the United Nations for organizing today's event on refugees and migration, which are the most pressing issues of our time. Like others, Austria has been facing large numbers of migrants in recent years — most of them refugees from crisis regions and most of them using irregular routes to Europe. We have seen one of the richest regions in the world, the European Union, struggling to cope with this phenomenon. Indeed, we have seen that it might have the potential to politically destabilize one of the most stable regions in the world. Austria, with its long-lasting tradition of coping with huge inflows of refugees — not least due to its location in the heart of Europe — is no exception to that. While migration overall should be and can be mutually beneficial, we also recognize in the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) that forced displacement and irregular migration can also present complex challenges to the hosting countries.

How can we deal with this? First of all, there can be no doubt that we have to stay firm in our commitment to respecting fundamental human rights and international human rights law, including when we are dealing with irregular migration. However, irregular migration poses significant risks for the migrants themselves. Thousands of migrants have lost their lives on the dangerous routes to Europe in recent years. Smugglers have ruthlessly exploited people in need, and often migrants are stranded in camps without adequate provisions of food, shelter and basic medical care. That is why we must put an end to irregular migration, in the interests of migrants and host countries alike.

With respect to this challenge, Austria will host a regional summit meeting on 24 September in Vienna to discuss closer cooperation and coordination among the countries along the Balkan route. While we must close irregular routes, we need to open legal routes at the same time in order to save lives. For example, resettlement schemes have already been put in place by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and we engage in a common effort to make them work efficiently.

We are aware that it is not only Europe that is affected by migration. We would therefore like to commend the efforts of those countries hosting very large communities of refugees in direct proximity to long-lasting conflicts. The New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), adopted here today, is very clear about the fact that no single nation can solve this problem. That is why all of us must do our fair share in this regard, both in the spirit of solidarity and in our own interest.

But all this will not be enough because, in the longer term, the only sustainable and most effective way to solve the problem is to solve it within the regions of origin — that is, we have to address the root causes of migration, which are conflicts, climate change and the lack of opportunities, increasingly caused by economic divergence across and within nations. These are the challenges to which we must respond. We need to increase our efforts in crisis resolution, as it is clearly effective and a precondition for further development. In this context, the United Nations, of course, plays a key role.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now give the floor to Her Excellency Ms. Erna Solberg, Prime Minister of Norway.

Ms. Solberg (Norway): The refugee crisis is one of the greatest challenges of our time, and we need to work together to address it. This is a global crisis that no country or region can handle alone. The time has come for a global approach and real partnerships. Migration has always been a driver of human mobility, development and growth, but migration should be voluntary, not forced by circumstances.

Many countries have made impressive efforts to provide protection under difficult circumstances. Norway will continue to assist refugees and internally displaced persons in conflict zones. We have increased our humanitarian budget by more than 25 per cent this year alone. We are receiving our share of refugees and we are working to integrate them into our society. We welcome and support the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), adopted today. Let me highlight four critical areas.

First, we must distinguish clearly between refugees and economically motivated migrants. Otherwise, we will undermine our ability to protect those who qualify for protection and endanger the entire institution of asylum. Secondly, we need closer cooperation on the return of people who do not qualify for asylum or protection. Countries must readmit migrants who have returned home voluntarily or otherwise. Thirdly, we must stress that international law already provides a solid legal framework for the protection of refugees. What we need is the more effective implementation of existing instruments and standards. Fourthly, we must address the root causes in order to achieve a long-term solution. That is why Norway will keep its development assistance at a high level and why we must all work together to reach the Sustainable Development Goals.

In this effort, closer cooperation among humanitarian and development actors is vital. Quality education and good health are crucial for reducing poverty and mitigating the root causes of migration. That is why Norway has increased its spending on education worldwide by 70 per cent over the past three years. That is also why our support for global health efforts equals a total of over $425 million in 2016.

We are also stepping up our support for education in times of crisis and conflict. The Syrian conference in London in February paved the way to increase support for job creation and educational opportunities for Syrian refugees in the region. I would now like to urge all partners to deliver on their pledges. We will not overcome the refugee crisis by building walls in future. We will overcome it by working together to find common solutions.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now give the floor to His Excellency Mr. Stefan Löfven, Prime Minister of Sweden.

Mr. Löfven (Sweden): Let me begin with a quote.:

“Sometimes I can see us again out on the boundless ocean, where the ship was tossed by massive waves that threatened us all. And sometimes I think I can hear the wailing from ships and people descending into the deep grave.”

This is a letter from a migrant. She arrived on a new continent along with thousands of others fleeing hunger and poverty. Her name was Ida Lindgren and the year was 1870. More than a million Swedes emigrated to America; many of them arrived here in New York at Ellis Island. When their lives improved, one out of five returned home, taking with them newly gained knowledge and spirit of entrepreneurship.

Today, Sweden is a country that people flee to and migrate to, not from. What have we learned?

First, we must fight the root causes of forced migration. Migration in itself will never solve inequality and injustice in the world. We must fight hunger and poverty so that people will not have to risk their lives on rickety boats. We need strong societies that share prosperity, promote decent work and inclusive growth and, most importantly, work for sustainable peace and security. Sweden will remain a leading donor, promote the link between development and conflict prevention, and address these issues when we take our seat in the Security Council next year.

Secondly, people fleeing for their lives must be able to find protection. For most refugees, this means a camp in a neighbouring country; for a minority, it means seeking asylum in another part of the world. For all of them, we have a shared responsibility. Sweden will do its part, and we will push the European Union to do more. We are calling for an increase in global support for United Nations agencies. Rapid response capacity and preparedness for humanitarian emergencies must be improved. A system for early warning and analysis is needed. We cannot shirk our obligations and leave the burden to a few. Protection is a shared international responsibility.

Thirdly, migration can boost development. When people travel and refugees return home, not only does wealth spread, but so do ideas and knowledge. That is why we should promote safer migration by combating human trafficking and protecting the human rights of all migrants.

When Ida Lindgren left Sweden in the late 1800s, the relatives she left behind saw the beginning of Sweden’s transformation from a poor agricultural society to what is now a leading industrial nation. This transformation was achieved peacefully, through decent work and inclusive growth, turning the wealth of a country into welfare for all. There is no better policy against forced migration than that, and it should be every Government’s highest priority to adopt a similar approach. But when societies fail, when the horror of war forces people to leave their homes, then we should all be there to share the burden and provide protection. This is at the very heart of our international cooperation and of our humanity.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Alexander De Croo, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Development Cooperation, Digital Agenda, Telecom and Postal Services of Belgium.

Mr. De Croo (Belgium): Belgium thanks the Secretary-General for taking the initiative to convene this important high-level meeting.

We especially welcome the adoption of the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) and its two annexes. These texts are important first steps towards a true, multilateral response to uncontrolled migration flows and to the question of refugees. Yet our work has only just begun. Today we are launching a common effort to elaborate two new compacts by 2018 — one to set the rules for fostering safe, legal and orderly migration, the second to establish shared responsibilities and true international solidarity to tackle the global refugee crisis.

Indeed, shared responsibility and solidarity are, for Belgium, the two guiding principles for dealing with both refugees and migrants. There must be solidarity with countries of origin and transit countries, as well as with host countries so that there is a better spread of asylum-seekers among them. Further, countries that face illegal and uncontrolled migration and refugee flows need assistance. Solidarity and shared international responsibility is required to end the war and violent conflicts that force millions to flee their homes, looking for safer and more secure places that are not always willing or ready to host them. Just as important is the responsibility of all Governments to do everything they possibly can to prevent their citizens from being forced to flee their homes or emigrate. Migration has to be a positive choice, not a necessity.

Only by tackling the root causes of irregular migration and forced displacements can we create the conditions for a safe, legal and orderly migration. To better understand these root causes, on Thursday, 22 September, Belgium, together with the Government of Mali, the International Organization for Migration and the Global Partnership for Sustainable Development Data, will organize a high-level event on the use of data to better understand migration. We hope that many will join us.

Another fundamental principle is the indivisible and universal character of human rights. In these challenging times in particular, we cannot treat human rights as trivial — not the rights of migrants, not the rights of refugees and especially not the rights of women and children who are often the most vulnerable groups.

Belgium strongly commits itself to a powerful and global response to these important challenges. Together with the United Nations and our European, Atlantic and other allies, we are strongly committed to reaching a peace agreement in the Syrian conflict. This implies the military and political defeat of the so-called Islamic State. Belgium is also strongly engaged in the European efforts to build partnerships around migration, to support the European Union (EU) military operation in the Southern Central Mediterranean and the EU Emergency Trust Fund for stability and addressing root causes of irregular migration and displaced persons in Africa, of which Belgium is the second-largest donor country.

This year, our financial contribution to humanitarian programmes for refugees has reached €92 million. For Belgium, this is historically our highest contribution, and we will continue these efforts. Of these €92 million, €65 million are in support of Syrian refugees, an increase of 25 per cent over 2015.

At the same time, we are focusing our international development policies on the least developed countries (LDCs). We have decided to allocate half of our official development aid to the LDCs in order to reduce the vulnerabilities of displaced people and help their integration into host communities. In our own country, we welcomed more than 45,000 refugees last year and, this year, our host and resettlement capacity will exceed 20,000.

In the distant and remote peace of this Hall at the United Nations Headquarters, we have today adopted the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), which is a declaration that goes beyond mere symbolism. The New York Declaration sets forth international obligations that protect the young girl who is on the run and who lives in a place she cannot call home, that give hope to the family that only knows the shelter of their improvised tent, and that offer a future to the child who has never known life outside a refugee camp. No one can escape this historic responsibility, not one leader, not one country, not one Government.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Don Pramudwinai, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Thailand.

Mr. Pramudwinai (Thailand): In contrast to Sweden's touching story about 1870, we also heard this morning about the unfathomable plight of migrants and refugees through the voice of a young woman named Murad. Her plea has shaken many of us here. Are we pleased that this meeting has had to be convened so that we look seriously into tackling this unprecedented yet enduring problem of humankind? Although it is historic, this meeting certainly does not stand alone, as it builds on many efforts across the globe designed to respond to the refugee and migrant crisis.

Thailand views this meeting as a valuable platform for many integrated efforts aimed at responding to large and mixed movements, as well as for future actions that must be concrete and based on the principle of international burden-sharing. Responses to large movements of migrants must be swift, coordinated and, most importantly, humane. To directly solve the problem related to large movements of refugees and migration, we must first look at the root causes and address the underlying factors of forced migration. Such efforts may require strong political will. They will no doubt encompass the protection and promotion of human rights in countries of origin and underline the linkages between migration and development. Prevention is the key, and in order to use that key, one must closely look at the root causes. Great commitment will also be required of political leaders.

At the same time, the impact of migration on first-asylum countries is less widely discussed. These countries are the ones that have taken the largest number of refugees and migrants, which has been a burden on their local economies and infrastructure, which has in turn created further challenges in the funding of health care, employment and education. As time goes by, a pull factor comes into play, as the conditions in countries of origin do not improve and more movements occur through dangerous sea routes or other routes of transit.

In regions experiencing a large influx of displaced people, it is necessary to separate those who are abusing the system from those who are in genuine need of protection. A robust screening process is therefore crucial in addressing that issue. Such a screening mechanism must also be used so as to devote particular attention to vulnerable groups, such as women, children and the elderly. There are millions of children who are on the move and leaving their homes. Some may be accompanied by parents or relatives, but some are completely alone; we must also offer protection to those children.

We all share the inherent values of humanitarianism and compassion, and we want to make this world a better place for all. Those core values should be able to bind the international community together and serve as a basis for cooperation. Thailand fully embraces those core values and, because of that, we respect the principle of non-refoulement. We are working to end statelessness and are starting to discuss with our neighbouring countries the safe and dignified return of displaced persons who have lived in temporary shelters along our borders for decades. Our humanitarian tradition has led us to provide health services for migrants, regardless of their legal status. We also value the contribution of migrants to our formal economy.

Today's meeting is a momentous opportunity not only to discuss ways and means for international cooperation, but also to remind ourselves that only by fostering our shared humanitarian core values can we have the power and the ability to protect irregular migrants and refugees and our children, who truly need us in order to lead full and happy lives.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): The Assembly will now hear a statement by His Excellency Mr. Malcolm Turnbull, Prime Minister of Australia.

Mr. Turnbull (Australia): Australia is one of the most successful multicultural societies in the world.

From the oldest human cultures of our first Australians to those of people that come from almost every Member State, ours is indeed an immigration nation. More than a quarter of our people were born overseas. Australians are not defined by religion or race; we are defined by political values, a common commitment to democracy, freedom and the rule of law, underpinned and secured by mutual respect. Those values drive our approach to migration. We invite 190,000 migrants each year to join our nation of 24 million people.

Our commitment to refugees is long-standing, as seen in our Humanitarian Settlement Services programme, dating back to 1947. That has made Australians truly global citizens, connected by family, culture and language to people across the globe. Those links drive economic development, trade and innovation. Australians are enriched by the cultural diversity of our community. We regard our people as our greatest assets and our unity and diversity as one of our greatest strengths. That is not a recent development. As just one example, there is the Special Broadcasting Service, the public broadcaster, founded nearly 40 years ago, which not only broadcasts in dozens of languages but interprets and celebrates our multicultural society and the values of mutual respect for the whole society. Diversity is an investment against marginalization and extremism. It helps our community unite rather than be divided.

At a time when global concern around immigration and border control is rising, the need to build community support for migration has never been clearer. Australia's experience bears that out. Addressing irregular migration through secure borders has been essential in creating the confidence that the Government can manage migration in a way that mitigates risk and focuses humanitarian assistance on those who need it the most. That has had a direct impact on our ability to provide generous and effective support to refugees. Without that confidence, we would not have been able to increase our intake of refugees by more than 35 per cent, leading us to have the world's third-largest permanent resettlement programme. We would also not have been able to commit to welcoming 12,000 additional Syrian and Iraqi refugees on top of the scheduled number.

Of course, not every country is an island. Each country needs to institute policies that suit its own circumstances. However, the reality of people smuggling is one based on profit from, and exploitation of, some of the most vulnerable people on Earth. We are also all too familiar with the tragedy of lives lost at sea. The unregulated movement of people globally is growing fast. We need measures to create order out of the resulting chaos, if we are to provide safe pathways for refugees and target those who are most in need.

Such challenges cannot be addressed without strong international cooperation. We need to work together to facilitate safe and regular migration for refugees and migrants and, above all, ensure that those who are able to do so can return to their homes safely and as quickly as possible. We also need to support, rather than duplicate, the important work of the International Organization for Migration and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Australia welcomes the momentum we are seeing in the United Nations system and internationally. We are committed to playing a role that provides resettlement options to genuine refugees, that sees our multicultural society grow from strength to strength, and that supports international efforts to help the most vulnerable.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on Mr. Perfecto Yasay Jr., Secretary for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of the Philippines.

Mr. Yasay (Philippines): The Philippines welcomes the political declaration of the high-level meeting on addressing large movements of refugees and migrants, with its annexes entitled “Comprehensive refugee response framework” and “Towards a global compact for safe, orderly and regular migration”. The Philippines has approximately 10 million of its citizens working or living overseas. For that reason, the protection of the rights of Filipinos overseas and the promotion of their welfare, as well as their recognition as active partners in national development, are among the deepest and most sacred commitments of Philippine foreign policy.

During the negotiations on the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, the Philippines strongly advocated the recognition of the positive contribution of migrants to inclusive growth and sustainable development in source, transit and destination countries. We likewise worked to ensure the promotion and protection of the human rights of all migrant workers, regardless of migration status. We also sought to include migrants in the list of vulnerable groups. In all cases, migrants’ needs must be addressed by the 2030 Agenda, with the view that migrants should be empowered.

We have therefore developed guidelines on migrants in countries in crisis, jointly with the United States, our co-Chair, other partners, and the International Organization for Migration. The guidelines provide best practices and principles in addressing the needs of migrants in the event of a crisis, whether caused by conflict or natural disasters, in their host country. The guidelines emphasize that the protection of migrants in vulnerable situations is a shared responsibility among the sending, destination and even transit States.

Today’s meeting is a critical step. First, in dealing with the negative perceptions of migrants, who, at one time or another, encounter xenophobia and fear, or are subjected to intolerance caused by a lack of understanding of others. Secondly, the meeting re-establishes the focus on the role of migrants as a positive force for sustainable development. This meeting is also a landmark event in strengthening the Government’s framework for international migration. We look forward to engaging stakeholders in the process of intergovernmental negotiations that will finally lead to the adoption of a global compact for safe, orderly and regular migration in 2018. That process must begin at the soonest.

With the same earnestness we welcome the adoption of the comprehensive refugee response framework (resolution 71/1, annex I). The Philippines has always kept its doors open to refugees seeking asylum. In years past, we granted asylum to Russians in the 1920s, to Jews, as well as to Spanish and Chinese people, in the 1930s. In recent years, we welcomed to our shores Vietnamese, Cambodian and Lao people from the 1970s to the 1990s. For the Philippines, the 1951 Refugee Convention and its 1967 Protocol comprise the cornerstone of international law on refugee protection. We therefore reaffirm our commitment to the goals of the Convention and its Protocol. We also support the 1954 Convention relating to the Status of Stateless Persons.

We will sustain our support for the emergency transit mechanism, a cooperation arrangement with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Organization for Migration. The mechanism provides for the immediate evacuation of refugees who risk refoulement and persecution in their countries of origin. We continue to support the UNHCR. Through institutional coordination at the global level, we can ably address the refugee crisis and provide effective and lasting solutions. Our support has been provided in the form of financial contributions since 1980, as well as through country-specific humanitarian assistance programmes.

This meeting is neither isolated nor insulated from the observant eyes of the media and the rest of the world. They are watching as we act together for the cause of the large numbers of refugees and migrants. Almost without any choice, millions of refugees and migrants are pinning their hopes for a predictable future on us. Surely we represent a positive force in their lives.

We are interconnected as people in this world marked by conflict and peace. Since time immemorial, some people have left their countries to seek a better future, escape an intolerable situation, or break away from the cycle of poverty and oppression in the country of their birth. Our answer to their need to live their lives all over again is to secure their journey and their destination, thereby fulfilling the worthy goals of the Charter of the United Nations, which states that we wish to “Reaffirm faith in ... the dignity and worth of the human person” and “promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom”. We must not fail those who need us most in their most trying times. Our actions will affirm our solidarity and common humanity with refugees anywhere in the world.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): The General Assembly will now hear a statement by Her Excellency Mrs. Theresa May, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Mrs. May (United Kingdom): I want to start by welcoming the focus of the General Assembly on this critical topic and by thanking the Secretary-General for his leadership. Across the world today there are 65 million displaced people. That has particular resonance for the United Kingdom as that number is equivalent to our entire population. It is also nearly double the number of displaced people of a decade ago. Yet United Nations appeals continue to be underfunded, host countries are not getting enough support and displaced people are not receiving the aid and opportunities they need.

So the international community must come together and find new ways to deal with the challenges we face today. That is why I welcome the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1). As the second-largest bilateral provider of humanitarian assistance and the only Group of Seven economy to meet our commitment to spend 0.7 per cent of national income on development assistance, we provide life-saving humanitarian assistance to millions of people each year. We have sought innovative and durable solutions to protracted crises, while working to build stability, create jobs and support the poorest across the world, helping those most in need and addressing the drivers of mass population movement. But we must all do more.

So the United Kingdom will continue leading the global response, and I will shortly outline further financial commitments. But today I want to talk about building a more effective policy approach, one which involves addressing the root causes of forced displacement, providing proper protection for refugees and reducing today’s unmanageable population movements.

As we see across the world, conflicts and crises are becoming more protracted, and the number of displaced people is increasing. We must continue our efforts to end conflicts, tackle persecution and human rights abuses and support those affected. As the New York Declaration states, it is the duty of every country to respond. We must also be clear that this crisis has been exacerbated by unprecedented levels of uncontrolled migration. It is not only refugees who are moving in large numbers; there are also those seeking greater economic opportunities. That is a global challenge imposing a huge strain on countries across Africa, Asia, the Americas and Europe.

Of course, controlled, legal and safe migration benefits our economies. And there is nothing wrong with the desire to migrate for a better life. But the uncontrolled migration we see today is not in the interest of migrants who are exposed to danger, not in the interest of the countries they are leaving, travelling through or seeking to reach, and not in the interest of refugees, for whom resources and popular support are reduced.

Alongside increased efforts to provide humanitarian assistance and sustainable development, I believe there are three practical things we can do to address the problem. First, we should help ensure that refugees claim asylum in the first safe country that they reach, and establish that as a principle. The current trend of onward movement benefits criminal gangs, endangers people and reduces the prospects of refugees ever returning home to rebuild their countries. We must do far more to support the first safe countries themselves, by assisting the refugees and host communities, which is an approach that is starting to work in Jordan, Lebanon and Turkey.

Secondly, we need to better distinguish between refugees and economic migrants. Failing to do so only encourages more people to put their lives in the hands of criminal gangs. We fully support the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, but we must ensure that it is properly applied and that countries have the capacity to do so.

Thirdly, we need to be clear that all countries have the right to control their borders and to protect their citizens. We must be equally clear that countries have a duty to manage their borders so as to reduce onward flows of illegal and uncontrolled migration. We need to do more to help them do so.

That is a shared global challenge for which we must all take our share of responsibility. The United Kingdom is committed to working with all participants to turn the commitments in the New York Declaration into reality, and together we can help millions of people who desperately need our help.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): The General Assembly will now hear an address by His Excellency Mr. Abdrabuh Mansour Hadi Mansour, President of Yemen.

President Mansour (spoke in Arabic): At the outset allow me to express our thanks and appreciation to all of those who contributed to organizing this meeting concerning an issue of extreme importance, especially for my country. In fact, Yemen is the only one among the Gulf or Arabian Peninsula States that has signed the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees.

Yet, despite all of the challenges facing my country, we have for the past 20 years provided assistance to refugees. We will continue to do so, as we have done, starting with the refugees from Somalia. Yemen has approximately 1.2 million refugees, including asylum-seekers and irregular migrants. Some 14,000 refugees arrive monthly in Yemen, including 12,000 from Ethiopia and 2,000 from Somalia. The number of new arrivals in the first half of the year exceeded 61,000, according to United Nations statistics. All those present here may know that Yemen treats all of its refugees like Yemenis. They work, attend school, live normal lives and compete with Yemenis in all walks of life, including commerce.

My country has actively participated in meetings concerning Somali refugees convened by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Moreover, Yemen has hosted numerous regional conferences on refugees. At the most recent meeting, in 2013, an important declaration was adopted, known as the Sana'a Declaration, concerning the status of refugees from Somalia and the Horn of Africa and the challenges they face. It discussed possible solutions and the importance of calling on the international community to increase its support to meet the needs of the refugees and mitigate their suffering.

The Republic of Yemen believes that efforts to address the large flows of refugees and migrants must be anchored in the root causes. Therefore, political solutions are optimal and are urgently needed in order to deal with the relevant disputes and conflicts. In addition, coordinated international efforts, shared responsibility and burden-sharing are all critical in dealing with the issue and in raising important questions that cannot be avoided.

Against that background, my country calls for cooperation and partnership on the part of the international community in sharing the burden and addressing the challenges. We cannot face the political, security, economic, social and developmental challenges alone. How could my country, on its own, deal with the situation of war and conflict resulting from a coup d'état by Ali Abdullah Saleh and the Houthi militia against the State's legitimacy, as well as national consensus?

We are suffering from innumerable problems generated by the large numbers of refugees fleeing from the Horn of Africa. That movement has manifested itself recently in the practice of using of refugees — especially those from Somalia — as mercenaries enlisted to fight alongside the Houthis. We have arrested a number of Somali children on the battlefield, a situation that demands further assistance from the international community to our country and its institutions.

I reiterate my call on all countries of the world for their solidarity and engagement in supporting Yemen in addressing the challenges imposed by that problem. We wish to stress the principle of international solidarity with the countries hosting refugees. Moreover, we must address internal displacement issues. My country has over 3 million internally displaced persons owing to increased militia attacks against cities and peaceful civilians, who are enduring severe hardship as a result.

Cooperation with the relevant international organizations is critical in ensuring the delivery of humanitarian assistance to refugees, migrants and others in need. All necessary support should be provided to those organizations so as to enable them to fulfil their mandates under international law and treaties, as well as national legislation. We stress the need to resolve long-standing refugee issues, and we must never forget the Palestinian refugees, who continue to suffer injustice and oppression. Here we would like to stress the need to ensure their rights to voluntary return and a just solution for their plight. We also underline the need for all States and international organizations to provide assistance to individuals fleeing from crises and to provide decent care and protection. Refugees and migrants must be guaranteed protection along their journey to a State of refuge.

I would like to thank all of the local, regional and international organizations providing support to Yemen, in particular the King Salman Humanitarian Aid and Relief Centre, the United Arab Emirates Red Crescent Society, the Kuwaiti non-governmental organizations and all of the humanitarian agencies in the Gulf region. I express many thanks to all of those entities.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Mevlüt Çavuşoğlu, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Turkey.

Mr. Çavuşoğlu (Turkey): First of all I would like to thank the United Nations for organizing such an important and timely meeting today. My country, Turkey, is today at the crossroads of irregular migration. With more than 3 million refugees, Turkey hosts the largest refugee population in the world. At the same time, we also continue to fight against human smugglers on land and at sea. Through the tireless efforts of our relevant authorities, we have been able to decrease irregular migration in the Aegean Sea by 95 per cent during the past six months. However, we also see that our unilateral efforts are insufficient for coping with the global problem.

We have to state, loudly and clearly, that the world needs a better strategy to deal with irregular migration and combat the traffickers. And we need it urgently. The strategy should have three dimensions. First, we need to address the root causes of refugee movements. That is not an option. It is an obligation. We must, for instance, find a political solution to the Syrian conflict in our region. Otherwise, it will remain a major source of irregular migration in our part of the world. If we do not overcome the structural problems of the least-developed countries, people will continue to search for a better future abroad.

Secondly, transit countries in particular should be supported. Countries neighbouring conflict regions are especially and disproportionately affected by the flow of migrants and refugees. Financial assistance and resettlement are key instruments in that regard. Unfortunately, our own experience shows that it is almost impossible to talk about burden-sharing. Officially, Turkey has spent more than $12 billion for the Syrians alone and if the amount that municipalities and human rights organizations spend is added, the total is more than $20 billion. The contribution of the international community remained at $512 million. We will continue to do what we can, but we have to admit that it is not fair.

Thirdly, negative rhetoric such as xenophobia, racism and islamophobia towards refugees or migrants must be stopped. Extremism will only increase the problems we face today. It will backfire and fuel terrorism. Today politicians, especially in Western Europe, must be more cautious than ever. Any strategy can be successful if it is carried out collectively. Individual efforts cannot produce lasting solutions. There is one lesson that the entire world must have learned by now and that is that no one is immune from the consequences of the current refugee crises.

Turkey is ready to do its part. Last year, upon our initiative, the General Assembly discussed irregular migration and the problems of Syrian refugees. Migration was one of the major topics of our Group of 20 chairmanship, in 2015. The first-ever World Humanitarian Summit, which was held in Istanbul last May, had one clear message about migration — One Humanity, Shared Responsibility. And now, we are committed to assuming a leading role in the preparatory phase of the global compact for safe, orderly and regular migration by 2018. We believe that this first-ever United Nations summit on migrants and refugees will help our efforts in dealing with irregular migration.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Hillary Onek, Minister for Disaster Preparedness, Management and Refugees of Uganda.

Mr. Onek (Uganda): Currently, Uganda is experiencing an unforeseen influx of South Sudanese refugees into the country, having received over 200,000 since the beginning of July alone. Add that to the current population and the continuing influx from the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi, and Uganda is now host to close to 700,000 refugees. We expect Uganda to be host to over 800,000 refugees by the end of the year. As a result of the continuous influx from the region, Uganda is, as of today, the eighth largest refugee hosting country in the world and third in relation to gross domestic product, in an environment where, globally, the asylum space is dwindling.

Uganda has endured such challenges since the days when it hosted refugees from Poland during the Second World War. Since 1959 to date, Uganda has on average been host to approximately 160,000 refugees. That solidarity has now been codified into policy, whereby refugee protection and management are integrated into our country's national development plan, as well as the United Nations Development Assistance Framework. The Government of Uganda is largely implementing a comprehensive response, which needs to be adopted globally. Our Government needs the commitment of the international community to ensuring sustained interventions in the protection regime in the country and to building strong partnerships internally, regionally and globally to address the question of forced migration.

Uganda needs support for transition to humanitarian solutions prospects for protracted refugee situations. It has the enabling frameworks in place and strong partnerships transcending the humanitarian development divide. Uganda will continue to ensure that the rights of refugees are respected through, first of all, prima facie recognition of all refugees, the provision of identification papers or travel documents, the registration of all children born in refugee camps in Uganda, and the provision of access to social services, such as health and education and to freedom of movement. We also give them the right to work and establish businesses.

Through the settlement approach, refugees are provided with land for housing and agricultural production either in Government-gazetted areas or on community-owned land. The current value of that land is approximately $50 million. Steps have been taken by the Government of Uganda to secure a loan from the World Bank that will help address the development gaps in refugee hosting areas and to develop the Refugee Host Population Empowerment (ReHOPE) programme. United Nations Country team involvement in ReHOPE would be indispensable and allow for assistance to be provided to the ReHOPE programme. The Government appreciates the recent commitment of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to giving $31 million towards ReHOPE interventions in 2016 and 2017. The Refugee Host Population Empowerment project is aimed at encouraging refugees to be financially and economically active and working together with the host community.

In addition to all of that, there is a need to develop the institutional capacity of the Ministry and the local Governments hosting refugees to maintain the current protection regime. This includes capacitating the Ministry's department with the requisite human and financial resources to implement the World Bank and ReHOPE programmes.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Prakash Sharan Mahat, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Democratic Republic of Nepal.

Mr. Mahat (Nepal): International migration is a multidimensional reality of our time, and we must face it effectively and in its entirety. We must seek to ensure orderly, safe, regular and responsible migration and mobility of people, including the implementation of a planned and well-managed migration policy, taking into account the various types and causes of migration such as economic, political, environmental, conflict and so on, and appropriate humanitarian responses in time of need. Migrant workers today constitute a significant portion of current human mobility throughout the world, contributing to the development and growth of most economies, as well as helping their families in the sending countries. The remittances they earn is not without huge and long-term social, cultural, environmental costs back home.

Nepal reaffirms the view that there should be coordinated and concerted efforts at the national, regional and international levels to protect and promote the basic human rights and dignity of migrant workers and also to combat violence against women migrant workers and protect their basic human rights. At the same time, rights of migrant workers, as recognized by the relevant international instruments, should be guaranteed by the host countries.

This morning we adopted the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1), which I believe will address many of the issues surrounding refugees and migrants. There are, nevertheless, some important issues that need our urgent attention.

First of all, the problem of the development countries that host large numbers of refugees should also be taken into consideration in the light of their capacity to do so and their ability to make commitments contained in the adopted outcome document. Expecting more commitments from refugee-hosting countries, including the least developed countries, would only add to their burden, rather than apply the much-discussed principle of burden-sharing.

Secondly, Nepal believes that since not all migrants are refugees, they should not be treated as such. For example, Nepali nationals in different countries are legally working there at the request of the host countries. Despite our limited resources and capacity, and given that we are a non-signatory country to both the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, Nepal has been a generous and long-standing host to refugees of various countries of origin on humanitarian grounds.

Nepal is grateful to the international community for the understanding and support it has given Nepal in managing the refugees within its borders. We have come to realize, however, that the issue of political refugees can hardly be resolved if the source countries stay on the sidelines. In the cases of refugees and migrants resulting from man-made causes, the responsible country should be held accountable rather than the country where the refugees and migrants are residing. That is especially true in the case of a country like Nepal.

While Nepal appreciates the concrete initiatives taken by many developed countries to resettle the Bhutanese refugees that have been living in Nepal for a long time, their right to go back to their homeland should be respected. At the same time, I would like to remind the Assembly that the remaining refugees living in refugee camps in Nepal are eagerly waiting to return to their homeland. The international community should continue to fund the refugees until they are resettled back in their homeland.

I now conclude, confident that the deliberations on such important international issues and commitments made here today and in the coming days will significantly contribute to addressing the issues relating to large movements of migrants and refugees. Nepal looks forward to the judicious implementation of the New York Declaration reached as the outcome of the high-level meeting.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on His Excellency Mr. Yun Byung-se, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Korea.

Mr. Yun (Republic of Korea): Last year, at the high-level meeting on refugees and migration, I cited the remarks of António Guterres, former United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, that the refugee issue is not a mere crisis of numbers but a crisis of responsibility and values. Yet we still cannot afford to breathe a sigh of relief. In fact, the sense of crisis has deepened. The footage of 5-year-old Omran Daqneesh in Syria, bloodied and covered in dust, was a stark call to reality, reminding us of the tragic death of Aylan Kurdi last year.

The issue of refugees and migrants is not new. However, what alarms us is the unprecedented magnitude of their movements and the complexity behind their causes. The number of refugees has reached its highest level since the Second World War. At the same time, forced displacement is inextricably linked to various push factors including conflicts, violence, terrorism, and crushing poverty. Moreover, prolonged conflicts have further connected refugees and migrants, as those who flee for safety may as well become migrants seeking a better life.

The twin crises of refugees and migrants are a multifaceted issue in which peace and security, development and human rights are intertwined. It therefore requires a comprehensive and holistic approach by the international community, as agreed at the first World Humanitarian Summit this May, held at the initiative of Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. To deal with the unprecedented challenge of large movements of refugees and migrants, it is crucial that we coordinate immediate and longer-term efforts in a systematic way, with the United Nations at the centre. In the short term, we should bolster protection and humanitarian assistance to those in need, regardless of their status. During this process, the principles of non-refoulement, fair legal processes, and the protection of human rights must be ensured. In that regard, we welcome the adoption today of the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) as an outcome of this meeting.

The Republic of Korea, the first country in Asia to enact a refugees and asylum-seekers act, has continued to improve its refugee status determination process and has facilitated better treatment for asylum-seekers. Last year, the Korean Government also launched a pilot resettlement project to actively join the international community's burden-sharing efforts.

To resolve the refugee crisis in a sustainable manner in the longer term, development cooperation should go hand in hand with humanitarian assistance. As refugee crises persist, there is a growing need to provide capacity-building to help refugees to stand on their own two feet again. The most vulnerable populations, particularly women and children, deserve more dedicated attention.

In addition, my Government has expanded financial assistance for refugees tenfold over the past five years. We are also linking humanitarian assistance and development through the provision of education, health and vocational training to refugees. Through the Better Life for Girls initiative, put forth by President Park Geun-hye at the United Nations summit for the adoption of the post-2015 development agenda in September last year (see A/70/PV.7), the Republic of Korea is particularly focusing on women's empowerment.

Along with the high-level meeting on Syrian refugees in February and the World Humanitarian Summit in May, I believe that today's high-level meeting marks the third significant milestone in our search for a sustainable solution to the refugee and migrant crises. I sincerely hope that today's meeting will effectively garner the political will necessary to tackle the most pressing challenge we face together as humankind.

The Acting Co-Chair (spoke in French): I now call on Her Excellency Ms. Simonetta Sommaruga, Federal Councillor and Head of the Federal Department of Justice and Police of the Swiss Confederation.

Ms. Sommaruga (Switzerland) (spoke in French): Last year, Europe experienced what people in many countries in Africa and the Middle East have lived through for decades: the daily arrival of thousands of people seeking protection or a better life. How has Europe responded to this significant challenge? As we have seen, Europe was not prepared. Often overwhelmed, it was unable to respond collectively to the crisis. Regrettably, the crisis showed that in emergencies, many think only of themselves.

Today, Europe still lacks a common asylum policy. However, the arrival of thousands of people fleeing war has given rise to joint action in Europe. The relocation and resettlement programmes were agreed to last year under major political pressure. Even if they do not go very far, they are at least going in the right direction — towards shared responsibility. From now on we must not let migration be exploited by populist parties for domestic political purposes.

That said, what is the international community's role in dealing with the rise in migration movements? It is fivefold. First, to this day the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the human-rights treaties remain the best instruments for ensuring that migrants and refugees are protected. Secondly, we must find ways of sharing the responsibilities that result from these international challenges, equitably and on a global scale. Thirdly, we must come up with ways of responding to the new kinds of forced displacement that we are seeing, such as movements caused by global warming. That is also why Switzerland supports integrating the International Organization for Migration into the United Nations system. Fourthly, multilateral policies should always view migration as a cause for hope. In most cases, emigrants work hard and thus help to improve well-being in their countries of residence just as much as in their countries of origin. Fifthly and lastly, multilateral migration policies require platforms that promote discussion and cooperation between States.

For all those reasons, Switzerland believes firmly in the importance of supporting the New York Declaration for Refugees and Migrants (resolution 71/1) that we have adopted today. It emphasizes the three priorities that we believe will be essential in the future — strengthening the protection of refugees and migrants in vulnerable situations, preventing forced displacement by addressing their underlying causes and promoting displaced persons' economic and social autonomy, while taking into consideration the interests and needs of local populations. Switzerland also supports producing two global compacts on migration and refugees by 2018. The success of those initiatives will depend on their ability to take advantage of the expertise available in Geneva, as the nerve centre of issues relating to migration and refugees. In that regard, Switzerland declares its willingness to lend its full support and play an active and dynamic role in the area.

History has always shown us that there are always two ways to respond to broad international challenges. One consists of retreating into one's domestic affairs; the other is about displaying the courage to take innovative steps to achieve stronger multilateral cooperation. The crises that have occurred around migration have often turned out to be at the heart of our greatest multilateral advances. In that regard, we should recall the Geneva Convention, which was birthed in the wake of the Second World War. Many questions remain open regarding multilateral policy on refugees and migration, just as there are many different interests operating, some of them opposed to one another. But we need only one compass direction to steer by, and that is human dignity.

The meeting rose at 1.35 p.m.