I. Introduction

1. At its 5th meeting, on 23 June 2014, the Special Committee adopted draft resolution A/AC.109/2014/L.6 on the question of the Special Committee decision of 17 June 2013 concerning Puerto Rico. In paragraph 11 of the resolution, the Special Committee requested the Rapporteur to submit a report on the implementation of the resolution. The present report was prepared by the Rapporteur in compliance with that request. It considers Puerto Rico in the light of previous reports prepared by the Rapporteur; recent political, economic, military and regional developments concerning Puerto Rico; and action taken by United Nations bodies on the matter.

II. Background information

A. General

2. Puerto Rico is the most easterly and smallest island of the Greater Antilles, in the Caribbean Sea. It has a land area of 8,959 km<sup>2</sup>, including the small nearby islands of Vieques, Culebra and Mona. More than three fourths of Puerto Rico is mountainous and the range that runs its length reaches an elevation of 1,338 m at its highest point.

3. Over the past six decades, the island evolved from an agricultural to an urban/industrial society, with slower population growth, higher life expectancy and massive migration to the United States of America. Most of the inhabitants speak Spanish, although a number also speak English.

4. According to the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico, the population of Puerto Rico in 2014 was estimated at 3.6 million with a population growth rate of -0.65 and a net migration rate of -8.93 migrants/1,000 population.<sup>1</sup> According to a 2014 Pew Research Center report,<sup>2</sup> Puerto Rico has lost more migrants to the United States mainland since 2010 than during the 1980s or 1990s. The report found that the search for economic opportunity was the most commonly given explanation for the migration of island-born Puerto Ricans to the mainland from 2006 to 2013. The United States Census Bureau projects the island's population loss will continue gradually through at least 2050, when it is expected that about 3 million people will live there. In 2010, the total population had decreased by 2.2 per cent as compared with 2000, owing to migration and a low birth rate. The fact that the majority of people leaving the island today are young professionals contributes to a brain drain. According to the data of the Economic Analysis Division of the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico, as of December 2014, the life expectancy at birth was 79.09 years for the total population (82.8 years for females and 75.46 years for males). According to the same source, between 2000 and 2007, about 359,585 Puerto Ricans settled in the continental United States, while almost one million had settled there between the 1950s and the 1980s. An estimated 4.6 million Puerto Ricans currently live in the United States.

5. United States citizenship is granted to people born in Puerto Rico. They do not have the right to vote in United States presidential or congressional elections unless they reside on the United States mainland. In addition, the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico has recognized Puerto Rican citizenship in a Court decision. Puerto Rico's Department of State issues a certification of such citizenship, which Puerto Ricans may claim through a protocol established by the Department.

6. The main political parties in the Territory differentiate themselves mostly by their position on the ultimate political status of Puerto Rico, with none being satisfied with the status quo. The Partido Popular Democrático (PPD) favours an enhanced commonwealth status that is non-territorial and non-colonial. Under non-territorial status, Puerto Rico would cease to be subject to the territorial clause of the United States Constitution. United States citizenship would be retained but Puerto Rico would have greater governmental authority over its own affairs and more latitude to establish regional and international relations. A sector of PPD would like to legitimize once again the present free associated State status, which was rejected by the majority of the Puerto Rican people in the first part of the 6 November 2012 plebiscite. The Partido Nuevo Progresista (PNP) favours Puerto Rico's full integration as a State of the United States. Support for PPD remains slightly higher than for PNP. The third party, the Partido Independentista Puertorriqueño (PIP), favours independence for the island. There are pro-independence groups and organizations that do not participate in the elections because they consider that in a colonial context, elections do not represent a true democratic exercise, while some cast strategic votes in favour of the PPD candidate for Governor in order to prevent the ascension to power of statehood supporters. In the upper house, PPD holds 18 of 27 seats, PNP holds 8 and PIP 1. In the lower house, PPD holds 28 of 51 seats and PNP 23.

B. Constitutional and political status

7. Puerto Rico currently holds commonwealth status with the United States. The 1952 Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is described in detail in paragraphs 91 to 119 of the Rapporteur's report of 1974 (A/AC.109/L.976). In brief, the Government consists of: (a) a Governor elected for four years at each general election; (b) a Legislative Assembly comprising two houses, the Senate (27 members) and the House of Representatives (51 members), elected by direct vote of the adult population at each general election; and (c) a Supreme Court and lower courts. The jurisdiction of the United States federal courts includes Puerto Rico. Puerto Rico is represented in the United States Government by a Resident Commissioner, who is a non-voting member of the United States House of Representatives, but a voting member of any committees on which he or she sits.

8. There are two judicial systems: Puerto Rico's courts and the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico. The latter functions in Puerto Rico with limited jurisdiction and can be reached only for cases under United States federal law or for cases where there is diversity of State citizenship, that is, when a citizen of one State sues a citizen of another State. Cases before Puerto Rico's Supreme Court involving federal law can be appealed to the United States Supreme Court. Appeals to the First Circuit are taken from the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, which is a first-instance court.

9. Even after the establishment of a constitutional Government for Puerto Rico in 1952, United States congressional authority over Puerto Rico remained unaltered. The United States Congress is vested with plenary power over Puerto Rico, including in the areas of defence, international relations, external trade, monetary and other matters, while the island is vested with local authority over designated areas. All laws concerning the Territory's relations with the United States remained in force through the Federal Relations Act (see A/AC.109/L.976, paras. 120-132), under which Puerto Rico was brought within the trade, tariff and monetary systems of the United States. The United States also undertook responsibility for the defence of Puerto Rico. In 1958, Puerto Rico's Legislative Assembly requested changes in the Federal Relations Act, but they were not enacted. In 1959, three bills requesting changes in the political status of the Territory were submitted to the United States Congress, but no action was taken on any of them.

10. The results of a 1993 plebiscite, with virtually identical options to those offered in a previous plebiscite in 1967, were 48.4 per cent for the status quo (commonwealth), 46.2 per cent for statehood and 4 per cent for independence. Following this result and a request for clarification by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico, Congress replied that the definition contained expectations that were not viable (see A/AC.109/1999/L.13, paras. 172-180). The Legislative Assembly then voted to hold another plebiscite in 1998.

11. The results of the plebiscite held on 13 December 1998 were as follows: 50.4 per cent for "none of the above", an option included by means of court action pursued by PPD; 46.7 per cent for statehood; 2.3 per cent for independence; 0.3 per cent for free association; and 0.06 per cent for commonwealth status. In the plebiscite, independence supporters distinguished themselves by also casting votes with the "none of the above" option, in an act of repudiation of what was considered an undemocratic exercise. Some political and civil society sectors increasingly question the validity of plebiscites by whose results the Government of the United States is not bound, and also whether the United States is actually willing to extend statehood. Many also call for a process of self-determination and decolonization in conformity with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and resolutions of the Special Committee on the matter.

12. In July 2005, a vote was held whereby 84 per cent of voters opted in favour of a unicameral legislature for Puerto Rico. Although only 22 per cent of registered voters participated in that referendum, the results triggered a process whereby another referendum was to be held in 2007 to potentially amend Puerto Rico's Constitution and establish a one-house system in 2009. On 29 June 2007, however, the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico ruled that it could not force the Legislative Assembly to initiate a constitutional amendment process for establishing a unicameral legislative system.

13. After the 1998 plebiscite, the then President of the United States, William J. Clinton, established the President's Task Force on Puerto Rico's Status. On 5 December 2003, the then President of the United States, George W. Bush, named the 16 members of his Task Force, at the same time amending Mr. Clinton's executive order so that the Task Force would be required to report on the progress made every two years instead of annually.

14. In its December 2005 report, the Task Force stated that, while the current territorial status might continue so long as Congress desired, there were only two non-territorial options recognized by the United States Constitution, namely, statehood within the United States or full independence. The Task Force concluded that Puerto Rico belonged to but was not a part of the United States. It envisaged a two-stage process for an approach to the status issue. It first recommended that a federally sanctioned plebiscite be held in 2006 to ascertain whether the people of Puerto Rico wished Puerto Rico to remain a United States territory subject to the will of Congress or whether they wished to pursue a constitutionally viable path towards permanent non-territorial status with the United States. The Task Force then recommended that, if the voters chose to change the current territorial status, an additional referendum should allow them to decide between statehood and independence. If, on the other hand, the voters elected to maintain the current territorial status, the Task Force recommended that plebiscites be held periodically to keep Congress informed of the people's wishes.

15. It is important to note that, both before and since the issuance of the 2005 Task Force report, some have questioned whether Puerto Rico's status as a United States territory is consistent with statements that the United States made to the United Nations in 1953, following the adoption of Puerto Rico's Constitution, in requesting that Puerto Rico be removed from the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In its official request to the United Nations, the United States stated that Congress had given Puerto Rico the freedom to conduct its own internal government subject only to compliance with federal law and the United States Constitution.

16. Prior to the submission of the official request, the United States representative to the United Nations indicated orally that mutual consent would be needed to make changes in the relationship between Puerto Rico and the United States. That statement notwithstanding, the Department of Justice concluded in 1959 that Puerto Rico remained a Territory and was fully subject to congressional authority under the territorial clause of the United States Constitution. A broad spectrum of Puerto Rico's political and civil society sectors participating in hearings on Puerto Rico by the Special Committee maintain that the process of consultation of the Puerto Rican people regarding the status issue should take place in the context of international law, United Nations resolution 1514 (XV) and resolutions on Puerto Rico adopted by the Special Committee since 1973.

17. In early 2007, the United States House of Representatives reopened its consideration of the political status of Puerto Rico, as two pieces of draft legislation aimed at resolving the status issue were debated in the Subcommittee on Insular Affairs of the Committee on Natural Resources. In March 2007, hearings were held on the two approaches.

18. The Puerto Rico Democracy Act of 2007 (H.R.900) was introduced on 7 February. The bill stated, inter alia, that:

The Puerto Rico State Elections Commission shall conduct a plebiscite in Puerto Rico during the 111th Congress, but not later than 31 December 2009. The ballot shall provide for voters to choose between only the following two options: (1) Puerto Rico should continue the existing form of territorial status as defined by the Constitution, basic laws, and policies of the United States; (2) Puerto Rico should pursue a path towards a constitutionally viable permanent non-territorial status.

19. A second bill, the Puerto Rico Self-determination Act of 2007 (H.R.1230), was introduced on 28 February 2007, recognizing the right of the people of Puerto Rico to call a constitutional convention through which the people would exercise their natural right to self-determination and to establish a mechanism for congressional consideration of such a decision. The constitutional assembly is a procedural mechanism for the decolonization of Puerto Rico, which has gained ground on the island in recent years. This mechanism is supported by the Puerto Rico Bar Association and is mentioned in resolutions of the Special Committee on Puerto Rico. That bill had not been voted on by the end of the 2007 and 2008 sessions of Congress.

20. In December 2007, the President's Task Force issued its second report on the question of the status of Puerto Rico. Again concluding that there were only two options available under the United States Constitution, the Task Force reiterated the three recommendations that it had put forward in its 2005 report.

21. It was widely reported in the press in Puerto Rico that, on 2 January 2009, the President of the United States, Barack Obama, in a message sent to the new Governor of Puerto Rico, Luis Fortuño, reiterated that he would try to resolve the colonial case of Puerto Rico during his first term.

22. The President's Task Force on Puerto Rico's Status, as constituted under the Obama Administration, held its first meeting on 15 December 2009, expanding its focus to include matters affecting the economic development of Puerto Rico. President Obama signed an executive order on 30 October 2009 that preserved the Task Force's original mission and required it to provide advice and recommendations to the President and Congress on policies that promoted job creation, education, health care, clean energy and economic development on the islands. The Task Force comprises designees of each member of the President's Cabinet and the Co-Chairs of the President's Inter-Agency Group on Puerto Rico.

23. On 3 March 2010, the Task Force held hearings in San Juan. Testimony reflected a consensus that the Task Force must first address the status issue. The possibility of the constitutional assembly's serving as a mechanism for deciding the future political status of Puerto Rico was also broadly discussed during the hearings. There was objection to changes under the agenda of the Task Force, it being argued that it was contradictory to speak of economic development under the colonial model. The third report of the Task Force, issued in March 2011, included an overview of the relationship between the United States and Puerto Rico and the status issue, an executive summary covering status, economic development and recommendations in relation to Vieques, and a description of the next steps of the Task Force, which included the implementation of the recommendations, consideration of reports received from its members on the engagement of federal agencies concerning the recommendations presented in the report, and the holding of at least two summits in Puerto Rico in the following two years focusing on specific subject areas.

24. Most of the report's content on status consisted of recommendations for an accelerated decision process regarding the status issue whereby Puerto Ricans could express their will regarding status options and action would be taken by the end of 2012 or soon after. The Task Force recommended that under the United States Constitution the permissible status options include statehood, independence, free association and nationhood as a free associated State (commonwealth). The report included a description of each option. The Task Force specified that the United States Congress had the ultimate authority over the admission of States and that full independence involved a transition, including regarding citizenship status. The Task Force recommended that citizenship be preserved for Puerto Ricans who are United States citizens at the time of any transition to independence. The Task Force stated that under the commonwealth option, Puerto Rico would remain, as at present, subject to the territorial clause of the United States Constitution, although its local political autonomy should not be reduced or threatened. It also stated that proposals for an enhanced commonwealth status (commonwealth with greater powers) remained problematic because the mutual consent consideration was one that a future Congress could choose to alter unilaterally.

25. The Task Force further stated that it had a marginal preference for a two-plebiscite process in which the people of Puerto Rico would first vote as to their preference for becoming a part of the United States through statehood or the commonwealth, or for becoming independent through independence or free association. A second plebiscite would then be held with a choice offered among available options, as limited by the outcome of the first. If independence were chosen, a second vote would be held on full independence versus free association. Regarding Vieques, the Task Force recommended measures for accelerating its clean-up, for boosting sustainable growth, for improving the quality of health care for Vieques residents and for protecting Mosquito Bay, which is bioluminescent.

26. Reactions to the latest report of the Task Force, as covered by the press in Puerto Rico, were mixed regarding the status recommendations, encompassing statehood supporters, proponents of the application of international law to the case of Puerto Rico and those whose opinion was that the marginal preference of the Task Force for the two-plebiscite process favoured the statehood option. The argument suggested in the last-mentioned case was that, if the choice was for Puerto Rico to continue to be a part of the United States, then in the second plebiscite, free associated State supporters would be divided, owing to the added option of free association.

27. Another reaction was that the extensive recommendations in the report regarding Puerto Rico's economy and social matters were tied to a status consultation process seen as favouring statehood, since the recommendations regarding the economy tended towards the further incorporation of Puerto Rico into the United States through increasing the control of federal agencies in the areas of education, health, security, the justice system, communications and energy. A future vote by the people of Puerto Rico for commonwealth status would then involve a choice not for such status as it exists today, but rather for further integration into the United States, albeit not for the status of an incorporated territory. In his 2013 State of the Union address, delivered after having been inaugurated for his second term, Mr. Obama did not mention Puerto Rico, as some observers had expected he would.

28. A plebiscite, the fourth in the past 45 years, was held in Puerto Rico on 6 November 2012, on the same day as gubernatorial and municipal elections and the United States presidential elections. Almost 80 per cent of the island's electorate took part in the plebiscite.

29. Puerto Rican voters were asked: (a) whether they agreed with maintaining Puerto Rico's territorial status (commonwealth, yes or no); and (b) to indicate the political status they preferred from among three possibilities: statehood, independence or “sovereign commonwealth”, a version of commonwealth status not supported by PPD. On the first question, 970,910 (54 per cent) voted “no”, i.e., in opposition to maintaining the current political status, and 828,077 (46 per cent) voted “yes”, i.e., in favour of maintaining the current political status. Of those who pronounced on the second question, 834,191 (61.16 per cent) chose statehood; 454,768 (33.34 per cent) chose free association; and 74,895 (5.49 per cent) chose independence. Some argue, on the basis of that result, that statehood was the clear victor and that blank votes should not be taken into account. However, 26 per cent of the voters left the second question blank, and there appears to be overall agreement that those voters were not in favour of statehood. Therefore, some maintain that when the blank or protest votes are factored in, the absolute majority (55 per cent) is actually against statehood. On the basis of those results, it appears that Puerto Ricans rejected the current commonwealth government status but were unable to agree on an alternative.

30. Puerto Rico has viewed the plebiscite as, alternatively, an opportunity to improve the island’s economic future, a chance to shake off the vestiges of its colonial past and a ploy on the part of the Governor to win a second term. In Washington, D.C., the response to the 2012 plebiscite was mixed. The interpretations of the results by some members of the United States Congress mirrored the diverse interpretations on the island. In April 2013, Mr. Obama indicated that the United States budget included $2.5 million for yet another plebiscite. In August, the United States Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee held a hearing on the referendum. The Chairman of the Committee, Ron Wyden (Democrat of Oregon), and Representative Lisa Murkowski (Republican of Alaska), the ranking Republican member of the panel, concurred that the vote made clear that the majority of Puerto Ricans did not favour the “current territorial status”.

31. For its part, in December 2013, the White House issued a statement noting that:

(T)he results were clear, the people of Puerto Rico want the issue of status resolved, and a majority chose statehood in the second question. Now is the time for Congress to act and the administration will work with them on that effort so that the people of Puerto Rico can determine their own future.

32. In 2014, the Puerto Rico Status Resolution Act (S. 2020) was introduced before the United States Senate and on 12 February 2014, referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. The bill would authorize the State Elections Commission of Puerto Rico to provide for a ratification vote on the admission of Puerto Rico as a State of the United States on an equal footing with the several States in all respects. The bill was not enacted. In 2013, a bill setting forth the process for Puerto Rico’s being admitted as a State of the Union (H.R. 2000) was introduced before the United States House of Representatives, but was not enacted.

33. On 4 February 2015, Puerto Rico’s Resident Commissioner in Washington, D.C., introduced, before the United States House of Representatives, a bill (the Puerto Rico Statehood Admission Process Act (H.R. 727)) setting forth the process for Puerto Rico’s admission as a State of the Union. The bill was assigned to the Committee on Natural Resources which has jurisdiction over Puerto Rico-related issues. At the time of the writing of the present report, no further action had been reported.

34. Mr. Obama's budget for fiscal year 2015 sought $2.5 million for objective, non-partisan voter education regarding, and a plebiscite on, options that would resolve Puerto Rico's future political status, which should be provided to the State Elections Commission of Puerto Rico. According to the Office of Justice Programs of the United States Department of Justice, the President's 2015 budget did not request a carve-out under the Edward J. Byrne Justice Assistance Grant program to support voter education on a plebiscite regarding the future political status of Puerto Rico. The funding provided for this program in fiscal year 2014 should be sufficient to carry out this program, since it is a one-time event rather than a continuing program. Further, the funds provided for the plebiscite should not be obligated until 45 days after the Department notified the Committees on Appropriations that it approved of an expenditure plan from the Puerto Rico State Elections Commission for voter education and plebiscite administration, including approval of the plebiscite ballot. This notification should include a finding that the voter education materials, plebiscite ballot and related materials were not incompatible with the Constitution and laws and policies of the United States. Regarding that possible plebiscite, the Governor of Puerto Rico appointed a commission integrated by former presidents of PPD whose task it was to define the options to be presented to the Puerto Rican people in the plebiscite. The members of this commission have not presented a report because they have been unable to reach an agreement, owing to the fact that a sector of PPD would like to legitimize once again the present free associated state status.

35. On the basis of a paper presented by an expert, Wilma Reveron-Collazo, the limitations of the projected plebiscite from the perspective of international decolonization law were broadly discussed in the Caribbean regional seminar on the implementation of the Third International Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism, sponsored by the Special Committee and held in Quito in May 2013.

36. In March 2014, the United States Government Accountability Office released a report entitled "Puerto Rico: information on how statehood would potentially affect selected federal programs and revenue sources" (GAO-14-31). The report reviewed what changes to selected federal programs and revenue sources might be made should Puerto Rico become a State. The report findings showed that of the 29 federal programs reviewed, statehood would likely affect 11. As regards three other programs, while the programs themselves would likely not change under statehood, eligibility determinations for these programs could be affected indirectly by changes to benefits in other programs. Statehood would not likely affect the 15 remaining programs.

III. Recent developments

A. Political developments

37. As described in previous reports, apart from general political questions, three specific issues have been raised at the meetings of the Special Committee in recent years stemming from the political status of Puerto Rico and its relationship with the United States: (a) the United States military presence in Puerto Rico, particularly on the island of Vieques; (b) the imprisonment in the United States of pro-independence Puerto Ricans accused of seditious conspiracy and weapons possession; and (c) the application of the death penalty to Puerto Ricans convicted on federal charges. In recent years, the issue of increased political persecution has been raised.

38. Throughout the incumbency of the Government of Puerto Rico elected in 2008, the major newspapers on the island reported on its intolerance towards minority views and violations of civil rights. Since 2010, they have reported on police abuse and on the compulsory nature of membership in the Puerto Rican Bar Association, a civil rights organization founded more than 140 years ago. In September 2011, the United States Department of Justice issued a report<sup>3</sup> in which concern was expressed regarding the excessive use of force by the Puerto Rico police, for example, against striking students. The report concluded that the police had violated the civil rights of broad sectors of the population. It also indicated the existence of police corruption. In September, the United States Attorney-General's office issued a report noting that Puerto Rico led all United States districts in the number of public corruption convictions (130) in 2011. In April 2013, it was revealed that the Obama Administration had allocated $95 million for the establishment of a Federal Bureau of Investigation facility in Puerto Rico.

39. The Governor of Puerto Rico, Alejandro García Padilla of PPD, was inaugurated on 2 January 2013 following a narrow victory in the 2012 elections. He secured 47.8 per cent of the vote against 47 per cent for Mr. Fortuño. After eight years in the minority, PPD now controls both the legislative and the executive branches for the first time since 2004. The next elections for Governor, the Senate and the House of Representatives are scheduled for November 2016.

40. The issue of the Puerto Ricans accused of seditious conspiracy and weapons possession and imprisoned in the United States (including Oscar López Rivera, who has been incarcerated for 34 years) has been covered in previous reports. In essence, a number of Puerto Rican organizations and political and civil leaders have claimed over the years that these were essentially political prisoners who received disproportionately long sentences. In August 1999, Mr. Clinton offered to release the prisoners conditionally, if they formally renounced violence. The offer was accepted by 11 of the original 15 prisoners, while 1 accepted a deal whereby he would be set free in five years. During 2002, another 2 of the original 15 prisoners were released although 1, Antonio Camacho Negrón, was rearrested in August 2006 by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Of the two remaining prisoners, Carlos Alberto Torres was paroled in July 2010, while Oscar López Rivera (now 72 years old) was denied parole on 18 February 2011 and remains in a maximum security federal prison in Terre Haute, Indiana. His appeal against that decision was rejected. Campaigns for the release of Mr. López Rivera have continued. He is said to be among the longest-held political prisoners in the history of Puerto Rico and in the world.

41. The National Boricua Human Rights Network submitted a petition for executive clemency to Mr. Obama, urging him to exercise his constitutional power of pardon to commute Mr. López Rivera's sentence from 70 years to time served and release him, noting that, by May 2013, he would have served 31 years in United States prisons. In June 2013, the daughter of Mr. López Rivera spoke before the Special Committee for the first time.

42. Avelino González Claudio, who was arrested in March 2008, was released on 6 December 2012. His brother, Norberto González Claudio, arrested on 10 May 2011, was sentenced to five years in a United States prison. He was recently released after serving his sentence.

43. According to the Puerto Rican media and as reflected in recent resolutions of the Special Committee concerning Puerto Rico, there is a strong consensus among Puerto Ricans in favour of the release of those imprisoned in cases related to the struggle for independence, in particular Mr. López Rivera. Such calls have come from persons ranging from the Governor of Puerto Rico and the Resident Commissioner in Washington, D.C., to figures in the arts and the Puerto Rican entertainment domain, and from local communities. Support on the international level includes the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. In late 2007, the Senate of Puerto Rico adopted a resolution in favour of the release of the prisoners.

44. On 5 November 2014, the thirteenth General Assembly of the Parliamentary Confederation of the Americas and the twelfth annual meeting of the Network of Women Parliamentarians of the Americas, held in Asunción, adopted a resolution asking the President of the United States to show mercy and release Puerto Rican political prisoner Oscar López Rivera. The resolution was presented by two Puerto Rican senators of PPD.

45. Lolita Lebrón, who was incarcerated in United States prisons from 1954 to 1979 for pro-independence actions, died on 1 August 2011.

46. The issue of the application of the death penalty to Puerto Ricans convicted of crimes despite the abolition of the death penalty in Puerto Rico in 1929, which was upheld in the 1952 Constitution, has been described in previous reports. At the meeting of the Special Committee in June 2014, several petitioners from Puerto Rico voiced their opposition to the death penalty. The representative of the Puerto Rican Coalition against the Death Penalty stated that in the preceding decade, seven capital cases had been tried in the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, but that the juries had refused to apply the death penalty, thereby sending a clear message that Puerto Ricans were opposed to it. Puerto Rico was one of the five jurisdictions with the highest rates of capital prosecution, in proportion to population, by the United States federal Department of Justice over the last 15 years. Death penalty trials were conducted entirely in English, a language in which only 10 per cent of Puerto Ricans could communicate, and people who declared themselves unwilling to apply that penalty were excluded from sitting on juries. The Government of Puerto Rico did not have the power to refuse the extradition to the United States of Puerto Ricans accused of offences subject to the death penalty. The representative of the Puerto Rican Coalition against the Death Penalty requested the Special Committee to refer in its resolution to the fact that Puerto Rico was the only jurisdiction in the world in which the death penalty had been abolished by the people but continued to be imposed by United States legislation. The text should also include the demand that the United States Government declare a total and immediate moratorium on the death penalty in Puerto Rico and prohibit its imposition in the cases already under way in the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico.

47. On 16 March 2015, organizations from Puerto Rico made statements regarding the status of human rights in Puerto Rico during an audience before the seven Commissioners of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission, which was held at the beginning of its 154th period of sessions. They discussed discrimination in Puerto Rico, including against women, children with handicaps and immigrants, and efforts by the United States Government to impose the death penalty in Puerto Rico in violation of the Constitution of Puerto Rico. The representative of the United States in the Organization of American States requested that the Government of Puerto Rico be represented by its Secretary of State, César Miranda. In his intervention, the Secretary of Justice called for the release of political prisoner Oscar López Rivera, while the Secretary of State, who was also present, stated that Puerto Rico should be included in the reports of the Commission.

B. Military developments

48. The tenth anniversary of the cessation of military operations of the live-missile and bombing range operated by the United States was marked in 2013. As previously reported, for many years Puerto Rico held an important military-strategic position within the United States Naval Forces Southern Command. In addition to its other military operations in Puerto Rico, from 1941 to May 2003, the United States Navy operated on Vieques, an island of just under 10,000 inhabitants located eight miles off the east coast of Puerto Rico. Vieques was used for naval gunfire support, air-to-ground ordnance training and amphibious assault exercises. Details of the military exercises conducted on Vieques during the period when the Navy occupied part of the island and of the related civil disobedience campaigns, arrests and lawsuits are to be found in previous reports of the Rapporteur of the Special Committee. Following the cessation of the military operations, the Department of the Navy retained responsibility for the environmental clean-up of the property, which is now a national wildlife refuge. According to recent reports in the press, the United States has so far removed more than 16.5 million pounds of munitions in an environmental clean-up expected to last through at least 2025.<sup>4</sup> The Puerto Rico College of Physicians and Surgeons considered it alarming, however, that in the past 10 years, the clean-up had achieved the removal of only 5 per cent of the contaminants.<sup>5</sup>

49. The people of Vieques continue to struggle for the resolution of related issues: (a) environmental clean-up and decontamination; (b) the return of the United States Navy lands, now under the jurisdiction of the Department of Interior Fish and Wildlife Service, to Puerto Rican peoples; (c) sustainable development and the health crisis; and (d) the future of the United States Roosevelt Roads Naval Station on the main island of Puerto Rico.

50. Vieques has been sectioned off for the purpose of the clean-up activities, with a portion of the eastern part transferred to the Fish and Wildlife Service of the United States Department of the Interior, to be added to the existing Vieques National Wildlife Refuge. The United States Navy managed approximately 14,600 acres in the eastern portion of Vieques, which were used for amphibious training exercises and air-to-ground manoeuvres. Unexploded ordnance and remnants of exploded ordnance, which contain hazardous substances, have been identified in that area and in the surrounding waters. The United States Environmental Protection Agency has also indicated that the hazardous substances associated with ordnance that might be present in Vieques include TNT, napalm, depleted uranium, mercury, lead and other chemicals.

51. In the western portion of Vieques, the Navy operated an ammunition facility until 1948. The facility was reactivated in 1962 and closed in 2001. Later that year, the Navy transferred 3,100 acres to the Department of the Interior, 4,000 acres to the Municipality of Vieques and 800 acres to the Puerto Rico Conservation Trust.

52. In February 2005, the Vieques portion of the proposed Atlantic Fleet Weapons Training Area site was placed on the Environmental Protection Agency National Priorities List of the most hazardous waste sites in the country.

53. In March 2008, a federal inter-agency agreement was announced between the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of the Navy, the Department of the Interior and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico for the clean-up of portions of Vieques and its surrounding waters. The agreement requires that the environmental impacts associated with past and present activities on Vieques and its surrounding waters be thoroughly investigated and that appropriate actions be taken in order to protect the community and the environment.

54. Culebra Island, located about nine miles north of Vieques, was also part of the United States Navy training facilities. Although military activities ceased on Culebra in 1975 in response to public safety concerns, clean-up of the island has been slow, owing in part to legal issues regarding the use of federal funds.

55. Some 7,000 Vieques residents collectively sought compensation for health and property damage in the billions of dollars in a lawsuit, Sánchez et al v. United States, in which they claimed that the United States Navy had been guilty of negligence by exposing the 10,000-strong population of Vieques to dangerous levels of toxins for more than 50 years, leading to a cancer rate in Vieques that was 30 times higher than that for the rest of Puerto Rico and other long-term effects. The plaintiffs' lawsuit failed.

56. On 8 December 2011, in a 361-page report released for public comment,<sup>6</sup> the United States Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, while accepting local claims that there was a higher incidence of cancer and other health problems on Vieques relative to the rest of Puerto Rico, stated that no proof existed that the problem was linked to United States military activity. The long-awaited report was widely criticized by Puerto Rican officials and Vieques residents long resentful of the infliction of health problems that they attributed to the United States Navy. The Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico and United States Congressman Steve Rothman also opposed the report (A/AC.109/2012/L.13).

57. In another report, the Agency, referring to the scientific data presented on health problems on Vieques, said that the limitations associated with those analyses introduced considerable uncertainty and made interpretation difficult. It maintained that elevated levels of some chemicals found in people's bodies could be attributed to causes other than military activity; and suggested that United States officials could work with the Government of Puerto Rico in obtaining additional samples and keeping track of health conditions on Vieques.

58. The report warned that some areas of the former bombing range continue to present a risk, stating that recently collected data demonstrated the remaining potential for localized contamination, which, if those areas were frequented by people, could become a health concern. The United States Navy has said that its forces accidentally fired 263 rounds of ammunition tipped with depleted uranium on the Vieques range in 1999, violating federal law.

59. According to some observers, the new report contains conclusions recycled from the 2003 report and lacks credibility. Public comments were to be submitted to the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry by 8 March 2012, after which the Agency would issue a final report, to include recommendations for future work to be carried out on Vieques.

60. According to the office of Puerto Rico's Resident Commissioner, a bipartisan group of 17 members of the United States Congress addressed a letter in March 2014 to the United States Secretary of Defense urging the Department of Defense to fulfil its responsibilities regarding the clean-up of the islands of Vieques and Culebra. The letter included three specific requests. First, the letter pointed out that one decade after the military had stopped conducting training exercises on Vieques and nearly 40 years after the military had stopped conducting training exercises on Culebra, there were still meaningful gaps in information about the types and amounts of munitions used on both islands, as well as unanswered questions about potential links between these past exercises and current public-health conditions; in this regard, the letter noted that citizens of Puerto Rico and, in particular, residents of Vieques and Culebra had a compelling interest in knowing, with a reasonable degree of precision, which types of weapons were used, where they were used and in what volume they were used in both islands; the letter further noted that the congressional report accompanying the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 encouraged the Department to make public all of its historical documents relating to its activities on Vieques and Culebra. Second, the letter urged the Department to implement what was suggested by the congressional language through allocation of the full amount of funding necessary to complete the clean-up of Vieques as soon as possible. Finally, the letter reminded the Department that there was a serious public safety threat in Culebra which required prompt resolution.

61. On 10 December 2014, Puerto Rico's Resident Commissioner announced that, as part of a comprehensive bill to fund the federal Government for the remainder of Fiscal Year 2015, the United States Congress had appropriated $17 million for the clean-up of Vieques and $1.4 million for the clean-up of Culebra. The report accompanying the bill also directed the Department of Defense to take a number of steps to improve the clean-up of the two islands.

C. Economic developments

62. According to the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico,<sup>7</sup> the dominant sectors of Puerto Rico's economy in terms of production and income are manufacturing and services. Almost 90 per cent of manufacturing is generated by chemical and electronic products. The service sector plays a major role in the economy. It ranks second to manufacturing in contribution to gross domestic product (GDP) and leads all sectors in providing employment. The economy of Puerto Rico is closely linked to that of the United States. During fiscal year 2014, about 71.8 per cent of Puerto Rico's exports went to the United States mainland, which was also the source of approximately 47.2 per cent of Puerto Rico's imports. In fiscal year 2014, Puerto Rico experienced a positive merchandise trade balance of approximately $20 billion.

63. Since 2006, Puerto Rico has been in an economic recession. The Economic Activity Index, a measure of the economic activity of Puerto Rico developed by the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico GDB,<sup>8</sup> registered a 1.4 per cent year-over-year reduction in December 2014 compared with December 2013. In October 2014, the Bank reported that the number of persons employed in Puerto Rico during fiscal year 2014 averaged 1,006,646, representing a decrease of 2.2 per cent compared with the previous fiscal year and that the unemployment rate averaged 14.3 per cent. During the first three months of fiscal year 2015, total employment averaged 974,800, representing a 3.3 per cent reduction with respect to the same period of the previous year, and the unemployment rate averaged 14 per cent compared with a figure of 14.9 per cent for the same period of the previous year.

64. In February 2015, Standard & Poor's Rating Services lowered Puerto Rico's general obligation debt by three notches, to B from BB, citing a judge's decision to void the plan for debt restructuring and Puerto Rico's potential inability to pay its debts. In a press release dated 12 February 2015, the President of the Bank expressed her disappointment with the decision, which also entailed downgrading of outstanding bonds of the Bank and other entities, including the Puerto Rico Sales Tax Financing Corporation and the Puerto Rico Municipal Finance Agency.

65. In February 2015, a United States federal judge declared the Puerto Rico Public Corporation Debt Enforcement and Recovery Act (enacted in June 2014) unconstitutional by virtue of allowing a State Government to modify municipal debt. In February 2015, the Justice Secretary announced that the Justice Department of Puerto Rico would file an appeal with the United States Court of Appeals.

66. In February 2015, Puerto Rico's Resident Commissioner re-introduced legislation that would empower the government of Puerto Rico to authorize one or more of its Government-owned corporations, if they were to become insolvent, to restructure their debts under Chapter 9 of the United States Bankruptcy Code. The bill was endorsed by the National Bankruptcy Conference, an organization that advises the United States Congress on proposed changes to federal bankruptcy law.

67. The policy of privatization of public enterprises or their components as an economic development measure has met with discontent. Despite broad protests against a proposal to privatize the administration of Puerto Rico's Luis Muñoz Marín International Airport, the Federal Aviation Administration approved the contract with Aerostar Airport Holdings.

68. As an austerity measure aimed at reducing Puerto Rico's then $3.2 billion budget deficit and address the issue of high public sector employment, more than 20,000 workers have been laid off since 2009.

69. The agricultural sector remains small and is declining. According to the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico, agricultural production represents less than 1 per cent of Puerto Rico's GDP and agricultural employment in Puerto Rico accounted for 1.7 per cent of total employment in fiscal year 2014.

D. Regional developments

70. In the Declaration adopted at the Third Summit of the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States, held in Belén, Costa Rica, on 28 and 29 January 2015, Heads of State and Government highlighted the Latin American and Caribbean character of Puerto Rico and, in noting the resolutions on Puerto Rico adopted by the Special Committee, reiterated that the issue was of interest to the Community. Member countries of the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States committed themselves to continue working, in the framework of international law, particularly in the framework of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), to make the region of Latin America and the Caribbean a territory free of colonialism and colonies. They entrusted the Community Quartet, together with other member States that wished to join the mandate, to submit proposals for moving forward on the matter.

71. The Final Declaration adopted by the Heads of State and Government of the Bolivarian Alternative for the Peoples of Our Americas (ALBA), who met in Havana on 14 December 2014, ratified Puerto Rico's Latin American and Caribbean nature and reiterated that its full independence and decolonization constituted a matter of great interest to the member countries of ALBA (para. 23).

IV. Previous action taken by the United Nations

A. General

72. Since 1953, the United States has maintained a consistent position regarding the status of Puerto Rico and the competence of United Nations organs to examine that status, based on resolution 748 (VIII), by which the General Assembly released the United States from its obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. It has maintained that Puerto Rico has exercised its right to self-determination, has attained a full measure of self-government, has decided freely and democratically to enter into a free association with the United States and is therefore beyond the purview of United Nations consideration. The Puerto Rican forces in favour of decolonization and independence have contested this affirmation. In paragraph 9 of resolution 748 (VIII), the Assembly expressed its assurance that due regard would be paid in the eventuality that either of the parties to the mutually agreed association might desire any change in the terms of that association.

73. Information on action taken by United Nations bodies with regard to Puerto Rico prior to 1974 is contained in the 1973 report of the Rapporteur (A/AC.109/L.976) and following reports.

B. Action taken by the Special Committee

74. At its 1st meeting, on 20 February 2014, by adopting the suggestions relating to the organization of work put forward by the Chair (see A/AC.109/2014/L.2), the Special Committee decided to take up the item entitled “Special Committee decision of 17 June 2013 concerning Puerto Rico” and to consider it at plenary meetings.

75. At the 3rd and 4th meetings, on 16 and 23 June 2014, the Chair of the Special Committee drew attention to a number of communications received from organizations requesting to be heard by the Committee on the subject of Puerto Rico. The Special Committee agreed to accede to those requests and heard a number of representatives of the organizations concerned at its 4th and 5th meetings, both held on 23 June (see A/AC.109/2014/SR.4 and 5). At the 4th meeting, the Chair drew attention to a report prepared by the Rapporteur of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/2014/L.13).

76. At the 4th meeting, the representative of Cuba introduced draft resolution A/AC.109/2014/L.6.

77. At the 5th meeting, statements were made by the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran (on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations that are members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries), Nicaragua, the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, the Syrian Arab Republic, the Plurinational State of Bolivia, Ecuador and Costa Rica (on behalf of the States members of the United Nations that are members of the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States) (see A/AC.109/2014/SR.5). At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted draft resolution A/AC.109/2014/L.6 without a vote. Following the adoption of the draft resolution, the representative of Cuba made a statement.

78. In the context of the approaching midpoint of the Third International Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism and the assessments and initiatives of the Special Committee regarding possible avenues in that regard, the Chair of the Bureau of the Special Committee, Diego Morejón, convoked a useful meeting with the representative of the Committee for Puerto Rico at the United Nations, Olga I. Sanabria Dávila.

C. Action taken by the General Assembly

79. During the sixty-ninth session of the General Assembly, no draft resolution on this issue was submitted to the Assembly for action.
