Statement

Ecumenical Women, a coalition of Christian organizations and denominations, and other non-governmental organizations (NGOs), welcomes the review of the Beijing Platform for Action at the fifty-sixth session of the Commission on the Status of Women.

We uphold women and girls as created in the image of God as equal partners with our male counterparts. We oppose all forms of gender-based violence, discrimination and oppression, and affirm the promotion of gender equality and justice.

We maintain that the empowerment of women and girls of all ages is fundamental to meeting the Millennium Development Goals and eradicating hunger and poverty in our world.

Despite 17 years of national policies and international agreement to advance women's rights, the goals of the Beijing Platform for Action and the Millennium Development Goals remain only partially fulfilled.

Ecumenical Women and its global partners are working to eradicate poverty and hunger, care for the sick, promote peace, initiate income-generating activities and share resources and best practices. Women's potential to contribute to development and poverty eradication cannot be fully realized until the United Nations and Governments address the discrimination, oppression and violence that women and girls face.

Ecumenical Women and its partners have recognized the following as current challenges to the empowerment of rural women and girls, and to their role in the eradication of poverty and hunger and in development.

Climate change, farming and food security

Despite advances made through the Millennium Development Goals, hunger and malnutrition persist. Communities that once had abundant resources now struggle to produce adequate food. Drought, uncertain rainfall, deforestation, rising sea levels, which cause salinization of the water supply, and the prevalence of natural disasters due to environmental degradation and climate change contribute greatly to global food insecurity. Resource wars over land, water and fossil fuels have led to massive dislocation of and violence against women.

Rural women play a critical role in agriculture. They produce food for both their families' consumption and for income. Many women and girls engage in small-scale agriculture and food production but do not own or control arable land, seeds and sustainable fertilizers, fishing sites, efficient farming equipment, markets or financial resources. Despite advancements made through global initiatives, access to clean water and effective irrigation continues to be problematic, contributing to global food insecurity. The policies of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the World Trade Organization and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development have led to a concentration of land in corporate hands rather than in the hands of local farmers.

Member States should recognize and value those who work the land and produce food. With the rise of environmental degradation and urbanization, the value of rural communities is becoming more apparent. Rural women play a vital role in agriculture and the production of food, and must be supported in climate change mitigation and adaptation efforts, as they seek to expand agricultural production.

Access to education

Education is a basic human right. Education increases girls' and women's participation in society and influences the welfare of their families and communities. Primary, secondary and tertiary education and training for rural women and girls are essential.

Reports from women around the world indicate that high rates of illiteracy persist, especially among rural women and girls. Women's lack of access to education hinders their ability to engage in development and income-generating activities for their families. Owing to gender-discrimination, cultural prejudices and early marriages and pregnancies, women are prevented from taking full advantage of educational opportunities.

Basic education concerning nutrition, health and hygiene, farming practices and income-generating skills would lead to development not only for women but also for entire communities.

Transportation and access to resources

Around the world, rural areas are characterized by inadequate infrastructure and public transportation, which hinders the exchange of goods and resources. Environmental conditions that make roads inaccessible during the rainy season or following natural disasters also contribute to the problem.

The lack of adequate transportation affects food distribution and also prevents people from accessing medical and social services, which are concentrated in urban areas. Women and girls who lack access to safe and reliable means of transportation are often forced to walk long distances, making them vulnerable to sexual violence.

Public transportation is essential to the health and safety of rural communities. Improving infrastructure and access to safe public transportation would enable women to participate in local, regional and international economies. It would also enable women, girls and entire communities to access better medical care and social services.

Access to medical care

Rural communities lack access to adequate medical care. Lack of basic medical care and nutritional supplements, high rates of maternal and infant mortality, and the continued spread of HIV/AIDS and other diseases mean that many women and girls serve as caregivers for their families and other members of the community, without proper protection (especially with regard to HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and other contagious diseases).

Women's caregiving work is not valued or paid. Increasing access to trained medical care would provide women caregivers with the opportunity to contribute other skills to their communities or to be paid adequately for the skills they provide.

Isolation and exclusion from decision-making

Owing to lack of support for agriculture and small business ventures, lack of access to education and resources, inadequate transportation and medical care, and continued violence against women, women and girls in rural areas often experience isolation. Although women contribute important skills to their communities, including farming the land, producing food, supporting families and caring for the sick, they are often not acknowledged for their contributions. Because of gender prejudice, inadequate infrastructure and transportation, and the time spent caring for their families and the sick, women are hindered from participating in local, regional and international economies and decision-making. Member States should recognize the contributions of women and the need for gender-based Government assistance, and work towards the inclusion of women on an equal footing in decision-making and governing structures.

Recommendations

Ecumenical Women encourages the United Nations to recognize the importance of those who farm the land and produce the world's food. Ecumenical Women recommends that Governments take action to empower women farmers in rural areas, by addressing environmental degradation and climate change, increasing women's access to land, protecting small-scale farms and cooperatives, and creating access to finance for women farmers for the improvement of agriculture and better nutrition for women and their families.

Ecumenical Women also urges Governments to increase women's and girls' access to education, so that they may contribute their full potential and skills to their communities and be fairly compensated for those societal contributions. Increasing access to education will build women's confidence and enable them to face challenges arising from contact with well-established male-dominated enterprises.

Ecumenical Women encourages the elimination of transportation constraints that prevent women in rural areas from accessing basic medical care and productive resources that would enable them to participate in local, regional and international economies. Ecumenical Women encourages Governments to create and support programmes for gender-based development assistance, recognizing the valuable contributions that women make to the health and well-being of society and the global economy.

All people, regardless of their gender or location within a State, should have access to basic human rights, such as nutritious food, education, transportation and medical care. Creating and supporting programmes that support those rights, especially for rural women and girls, will strengthen the global economy and promote the well-being of all people.

Ecumenical Women encourages the United Nations and its Member States to promote equality for women as active and equal decision makers at all levels of society: within their families, locally, nationally and internationally. Ecumenical Women asks the United Nations to work with its entities that focus on the promotion of gender equality and with other specialized agencies to develop awareness campaigns and reporting mechanisms so that gender equality in decision-making can be followed and monitored within Member States.
