Statement

We, the International Council of Women, are pleased to submit this statement from a global umbrella non-governmental organization representing millions of women worldwide in more than 60 member countries.

We applaud the Commission's decision to focus on the empowerment of rural women as the main agenda item at its fifty-sixth session. In many of our member countries women provide the skills, labour and dedication to ensure a safe food supply. Despite their efforts, often in circumstance of dire hardship, the livelihoods of many rural women are becoming uncertain. Many are fearful of the future. With rising populations and changes in crop yields and harvest patterns owing to, in part, the impacts of climate change, a depressed global economy and civil strife, rural women are struggling to maintain their productivity. The challenges are great, varying in different regions of the world from devastating natural disasters to problems of land rights and widows' rights to inheritance.

We urge the Commission to bring recommendations from this session that will frame strong action to support rural women by providing the infrastructure, including transport and communications, for speedy access to markets; ensuring that women farmers have adequate facilities in rural centres for the sale of their produce; establishing gender-sensitive credit schemes for women farmers to enable them to increase their productivity; recognizing and acknowledging the critical importance of their efforts to overcome poverty and eradicate malnutrition.

The International Council of Women, in supporting initiatives to empower rural women, urges Governments to work with village communities to revise customary law and abolish harmful practices affecting women and girls and to allow them equality, the right to own property, including land, and full access to education and training.

Our development project has continually added value to women's agricultural production through the provision of livestock, village water tanks and educational resources and training in literacy, human rights, budgeting, marketing and strategic planning. At our recent meetings, women's roles as food producers and change-makers on climate — defending the integrity of the planet — have been high on the agenda. Action by non-governmental organizations (NGOs), especially women's NGOs such as the International Council of Women, to conserve energy, plant trees, preserve local soil resources and carry out education at the local level for a carbon-free environment will be pivotal to the future health and well-being of the global community. By developing a toolkit for community education, the International Council of Women is leading the way towards a sustainable environment. As essential food producers, rural women are central to a sustainable economy.

Work on sustainability was at the heart of the International Council of Women 2003-2006 triennial theme, "Women in sustainable development — poverty eradication, water and the girl child". In November 2011, in preparation for the fifty-sixth session of the Commission, the International Council of Women held its Asia-Pacific Regional Council Seminar and Training Workshop in Nadi, Fiji, on the theme "Women in agriculture — building a sustainable future". Women's contribution to a sustainable global economy as change-makers and entrepreneurs was linked to attaining the Millennium Development Goals. The training workshop was entitled "Women, food security and health". Outcomes and recommendations provided a firm new threshold for the delivery of strategies to mitigate the effects of climate change, enhance regional food security and improve overall health status and nutrition at the community level.

Women were challenged and empowered at these ICW-CIF meetings.

Women farmers provide essential food production in every region but face critical challenges. For many of them, access to land for grazing and cultivation is uncertain. Increasing population growth in many countries and the recent rise in the cost of food means it will be necessary to increase worldwide food production by between 70 and 100 per cent by mid-century. In this environment the ability of rural women to increase their production will be the key to providing a continuing adequate food supply. Visionary outcomes from the fifty-sixth session of the Commission will do much to ensure that rural women are able to play their part in bridging the gap between food production and food consumption, which threatens future generations. Please be assured that the International Council of Women, through its affiliated national councils and representation at the United Nations, will be working to carry forward these outcomes.
