

Economic and Social Council

Distr.: General
9 December 2013

Original: English

Commission on the Status of Women

Fifty-eighth session

10-21 March 2014

Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and to the special session of the General Assembly entitled “Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century”: implementation of strategic objectives and action in critical areas of concern and further actions and initiatives

Statement submitted by Center for Reproductive Rights, a non-governmental organization in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council

The Secretary-General has received the following statement, which is being circulated in accordance with paragraphs 36 and 37 of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31.

Statement

In reflecting upon the successes and challenges of the Millennium Development Goals, the international human rights framework's effectiveness in advancing and protecting women's and girls' rights must provide guidance for future development agendas. International human rights norms have recognized the connection between women's rights and reproductive rights, clarifying that violations of reproductive rights are primarily manifestations of discrimination, poverty and violence.

Where women's rights to equality and non-discrimination are not fulfilled, women's ability to access reproductive health services and make meaningful choices about their reproduction is limited. Conversely, where women are unable to access reproductive health services, the inequalities and discrimination women face are exacerbated due to the differentiated impact that childbearing has on women's health and lives. Women face unique, gender-specific barriers in the realization of their rights, which result from discrimination; stereotypes in respect of women as mothers, caregivers and childbearers; and traditional roles. While the Millennium Development Goals sought to both improve women's access to particular reproductive health services and promote gender equality, these were viewed as two separate aims, which did not adequately account for the interconnectedness and reinforcing nature of these issues. It is only by addressing these issues in tandem that true gender equality can be achieved and women can effectively exercise their reproductive rights.

Furthermore, women may also face additional inequalities because of their race, ethnicity, socioeconomic status, disability status or HIV status, or because of where they live, further limiting their opportunities for development. Where these specific barriers are not addressed, they prevent women's rights from being fulfilled and inhibit women's ability to achieve their development potential.

In addressing the interconnected nature of these issues, treaty monitoring bodies have made clear that guaranteeing women substantive equality is essential for ensuring a full range of women's rights. In its general recommendation No. 25, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women noted that "the Convention [on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women] requires that women be given an equal start and that they be empowered by an enabling environment to achieve equality of results" and that "the position of women will not be improved as long as the underlying causes of discrimination against women, and of their inequality, are not effectively addressed". The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on the Rights of the Child and the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities have also all endorsed this approach.

To be in line with international human rights norms, substantive equality should be a core component of all development frameworks in order to ensure women both equality of opportunity and equality of results. As such, development frameworks should address:

- Power structures: States should examine and address current societal power structures and analyse the role that gender plays within them

- Potentially different treatment: States should recognize that equal treatment may not be sufficient to overcome inequalities, particularly when equal treatment disadvantages women
- Structural change: States should change institutions in order to address the inequalities experienced by women, rather than requiring women to change to conform to a male norm
- Equal outcomes: States should focus on equal outcomes for women, including for different groups of women, which may require positive measures, such as affirmative action and different treatment of men and women, to overcome historical discrimination and ensure that institutions uphold women's rights.

As a component of women's right to equality, States must also guarantee women access to a full range of reproductive health services, including comprehensive sexuality education, maternal health care, contraception and abortion. Treaty monitoring bodies have made clear that States must eliminate barriers to reproductive health services, including unnecessary restrictions on services only women need, high cost, mandatory waiting periods and third-party authorization requirements. States must also adopt policies and practices, including development policies and practices, that specifically address the barriers that women face to accessing reproductive health services and also proactively facilitate that access, recognizing that failure to do so is a violation of women's right to equality. These policies and practices should recognize the marginalized situation of women and seek to transcend historical discrimination, gender stereotypes and the traditional roles of women in the family and in society.

Finally, the new development framework must ensure that there are accessible mechanisms for effective accountability. Human rights frameworks have already been established and have proved effective in monitoring and assessing State compliance in transparent, international forums. International development commitments may also benefit from being linked to human rights monitoring and evaluation mechanisms, including courts, independent institutions such as ombudspersons, and political monitoring bodies at the local and national levels, as well as United Nations treaty monitoring bodies, United Nations special procedures, and human rights-based intergovernmental processes. By increasing accountability through the linkages between the human rights framework and the international development agenda, while recognizing the reinforcing nature of women's reproductive rights and their right to equality and non-discrimination, the effectiveness of international commitments targeting the advancement of women will be greatly enhanced.