APPENDIX

Explanatory memorandum relating to the request for the inclusion of a supplementary item, entitled "Elimination of coercive economic measures as a means of political and economic compulsion", in the agenda of the fifty-first session of the General Assembly

The General Assembly has frequently expressed its disapproval of the fact that developed countries are continuing to apply economic measures for the purpose of exercising coercion with respect to the sovereign decisions taken by developing countries. The General Assembly has affirmed this position on the grounds that such measures are inconsistent with the purposes of the Charter of the United Nations and, in particular, with the provisions of Article 1, paragraph 3, which speaks of achieving international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character, and of Article 2, paragraph 4, which states that all Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

The General Assembly has opposed the use of coercive measures because of their harmful impact on the economies of developing countries. Article 32 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 3281 (XXIX), stipulates that no State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights.

Also, in its resolution 2131 (XX), containing the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States and the Protection of Their Independence and Sovereignty, and in the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, annexed to its resolution 2625 (XXV), the General Assembly affirms that no State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights.

By its resolutions 44/215, 46/210, 48/168 and 50/96, the General Assembly urges the international community to adopt urgent and effective measures to eliminate the use by some developed countries of unilateral coercive economic measures against developing countries as a means of forcibly imposing the will of one State on another.

The Platform for Action adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women calls upon Governments and international and regional organizations to refrain from taking any unilateral measures that are not consistent with international law and the Charter of the United Nations and hinder the full achievement of the economic and social development of the inhabitants of disadvantaged countries, impede their welfare and create obstacles to their full enjoyment of human rights, including the right of all individuals to enjoy a standard of living appropriate to their health and well-being and their right to food, medical care and necessary social services.

In its resolutions 47/19, 48/16, 49/9 and 50/10, the General Assembly expresses its concern about the continued promulgation and application by Member States of laws and regulations whose extraterritorial effects affect the sovereignty of other States and the legitimate interests of entities or persons under their jurisdiction, as well as the freedom of trade and navigation. It reiterates its call to all States to refrain from promulgating and applying laws and measures of this kind, and it once again urges States that have and continue to apply such laws and measures to take the necessary steps to repeal or invalidate them as soon as possible in accordance with their legal regime.

Although the General Assembly has reiterated its demands that developed countries should refrain from imposing trade restrictions, embargoes, bans and other measures, they have continued to apply such measures to a number of developing countries. These measures assumed a new dimension when, on 8 August 1996, the President of the United States signed an Act imposing sanctions on foreign companies investing in oil in certain countries, including Libya.

The enactment by the United States of America of this law is not only a breach of international law that violates the principle of the territorial and personal character of laws, but is an attempt to exercise world hegemony, inasmuch as the United States Government is endeavouring to apply its own laws to citizens and entities in independent sovereign States.

The measure taken by the United States further shows disdain for the resolutions of the United Nations, which forbid the use by any State of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights. It also shows the contempt of the United States for the desires of the great majority of States, which have urged it not to enact laws that purport to operate outside its national jurisdiction and to impose sanctions on third-country companies on the grounds that such measures violate numerous resolutions adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the rules of the World Trade Organization calling for free trade among the countries of the world and for the freedom of States to engage in trade with other States to be free of restrictions.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya is of the view that, when a State Member of the United Nations disregards international covenants and resolutions and applies its national laws outside its territorial boundaries, and thereby endeavours to destroy one of the pillars of the international legal order, namely the principle of State sovereignty, then the General Assembly as the organ of the United Nations that embraces all Member States, must consider the matter and adopt the necessary measures to eliminate coercive measures that are incompatible with all international custom and international covenants and that impede the development of those friendly relations that all States strive to achieve.
