Explanatory memorandum

The Provisional Institutions of Self-Government of Kosovo, a province of the Republic of Serbia under United Nations administration, pursuant to United Nations Security Council resolution 1244 (1999), unilaterally declared independence on 17 February 2008.

Although an overwhelming majority of Member States have not recognized Kosovo's independence, this act has caused a number of controversies and divisions within the international community.

The Republic of Serbia has continuously striven to achieve a consensual solution to the Kosovo issue through negotiations within the framework of the United Nations.

We hold that the most principled, sensible way to overcome the potentially destabilizing consequences of Kosovo's unilateral declaration of independence is to transfer the issue from the political to the juridical arena. Aside from reducing the diplomatic tensions that have arisen since the unilateral declaration of independence, such an approach would contribute to strengthening the rule of law in international relations. With this in mind, Serbia considers that the United Nations General Assembly, in view of the powers and functions conferred on it by the Charter of the United Nations, in particular by Articles 10, 13 and 96, has a crucial role to play in this regard.

The Republic of Serbia believes that an advisory opinion of the principal judicial organ of the United Nations — the International Court of Justice — would be particularly appropriate in the specific case of determining whether Kosovo's unilateral declaration of independence is in accordance with international law.

The international community considers the Court's impartial advisory opinions to be the most authoritative interpretations of the principles of the international legal order. Member States share a deep commitment to the safeguarding of these principles, yet some are uncertain as to which arguments involving these principles they can rely on in this particular case.

Many Member States would benefit from the legal guidance an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice would confer. It would enable them to make a more thorough judgement on the issue.

Finally, an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, rendered in a non-contestable, non-adversarial manner, would go a long way towards calming tensions created by Kosovo's unilateral declaration of independence, avoiding further negative developments in the region and beyond and facilitating efforts at reconciliation among all parties involved.

By having recourse to the International Court of Justice, the General Assembly would ensure that the Kosovo issue becomes a symbol of renewed resolve concerning adherence to the rule of law by the international community.
