Annex*Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative of Nigeria to the United Nations on the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in Nigeria, made at the 67th meeting of the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict

We wish to express Nigeria's appreciation to the United Nations for all the support and invaluable contribution to our efforts at combating the menace of terrorism. We want to thank the Secretary-General for his report on children and armed conflict in Nigeria from 2013 to 2016.

The Secretary-General's report was very detailed in respect of the heinous activities of Boko Haram in the north-east of Nigeria, and so, we will not belabour the issue. However, we want to quickly state that, under the leadership of President Muhammadu Buhari, the ugly trend of Boko Haram capturing and controlling territories was successfully halted and the entire area of the north-east fully liberated.

The resultant refugee crisis was not unexpected, given the enormity of the humanitarian challenges the military had to cope with in ensuring proper profiling of the insurgents that had been captured, and rehabilitation and integration of the liberated victims. The report cited cases of credible allegations of violation of children at the camps by the Nigerian military. These allegations are inconsistent with Nigeria's staunch support of and adherence to the protection of children in conflict areas of Nigeria and the world at large. Under the watch of the current Nigerian Government, our military has continued to ensure that it conducts its operations with a high sense of civility in accordance with their rules of engagement. Collateral damages cannot be absolutely avoided when fighting a war. This accounts for the reported casualties (including children) recorded during the prosecution of the war.

The report also touched on the activities of the Civilian Joint Task Force. The Task Force was a child of necessity, whose mode of operation was rudimentary at the beginning. The Government has since organized and structured it, as indicated in the report. The issue of children being recruited into the Task Force has been addressed with the introduction of rules of procedure that only allow children of 18 years of age or above as informants or volunteers.

We are implementing the provisions of the two ratified Optional Protocols to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, on the involvement of children in armed conflict and on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography.

The Nigerian Government launched the Safe Schools Initiative, aimed at providing education and piloting safe education facilities in the conflict-affected areas of the north-east. Nigeria also endorsed the Safe Schools Declaration, by which it committed to implementing the Guidelines for Protecting Schools and Universities from Military Use during Armed Conflict.

Nigeria's laws and policies on the promotion and protection of the rights of children reflect our commitment to the relevant international instruments to which we are signatory. The Government is operating an enabling environment that provides children with equal opportunities, protects their rights and facilitates their full participation in society. A national child policy is in place to further facilitate the actualization of the rights enshrined in the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Child's Rights Act.

The Child's Rights Act, which was signed into law in 2003, prohibits all physical and mental abuse of children. The Government was at the vanguard of supporting and ratifying the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples'

Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa; article 6 of the Charter sets the minimum age for marriage at 18. The Government also adopted a national action plan to monitor compliance with international human rights obligations. Within this framework, a human rights commissioner was appointed as special rapporteur on the rights of children. The mandate for this position was to monitor and assemble data on child rights abuse.

The Government has also set up agencies with a mandate to protect children. The National Human Rights Commission, established in 1995 to protect and enforce human rights in general, is very active in the fight against child abuse. The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons works in partnership with United Nations agencies and other government institutions, at both the federal and state levels, to carry out the fight against trafficking in persons, preventing trafficking, rehabilitating trafficked persons and prosecuting offenders with particular emphasis on child trafficking.

A national priority agenda for vulnerable children (2013–2020) has been developed as a strategic framework to guide the multisectoral operationalization of the Vision 20:2020 strategies and objectives of ensuring the protection of the most vulnerable children in Nigeria. Funding has been made available to bolster public awareness. The Government also created the Children’s Parliament, as well as public holidays such as Children’s Day and Day of the African Child. Several non-governmental organizations also complement the efforts of the Government.

The federal Government also signed an agreement with the International Labour Organization and the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour to establish shelter centres to rehabilitate trafficked children and reunite them with their families. In addition, the Government recently adopted the National Policy on Child Labour, aimed at protecting children against all kinds of abuse in the workplace and all forms of labour that militate against the proper development of the child. This is in line with our approach to fighting human trafficking, which combines law enforcement with policies aimed at prevention of trafficking and protection of the victim.

Nigeria is aware of the challenges in the fight to protect children and acknowledges that there is still work to be done. The Government is firmly committed to the task of protecting her children and counts on the continued support of the United Nations in this regard. The Government will uphold all its obligations under relevant international instruments pertaining to international humanitarian law.
